The author treats poetic phenomena as being definitely knowable in terms of scientific truth; seeks to discover the essential elements of poetic forms of expression in the history of their development; endeavors briefly to classify these in simple and intelligible categories, and to examine English poetry in relation to these categories with a view to formulating a practical English prosody based upon essential characteristics of English poetic form.

"The object of the present work is to present a consecutive history of the Mormons, from the day of their origin to the present writing, and as a secular, not as a religious narrative. The search has been for facts, not for moral deductions, except as these present themselves in the course of the story. Since the usual weapon which the heads of the Mormon church use to meet anything unfavorable regarding their organization is a general denial, this narrative has been made to rest largely on Mormon sources of information."—Preface.

A love story, by the author of "Madame Butterfly." "Nan" is a wilful, up-to-date girl, whose aunt calls upon a favorite nephew to save Nan from a flock of matrimonially inclined men, so that the girl may "remember Cawdor," an English clergyman to whom her aunt allotted her in childhood. Cawdor writes "ladylike" letters from across the sea, which fill his sweetheart with a desire to give him a severe shock. The comedy that follows is witty, yet tender throughout.

An elaborate work, profusely illustrated. One of the most important additions made to the literature of exploration and discovery on this continent in many years. The five years of research in Northwestern Mexico was made under the auspices and support of the American Museum of Natural History and the American Geographical Society, together with many public-spirited citizens. Dr. Lumholtz's object was the study of the few races of primitive man yet unmodified by their civilized neighbors.

Mr. McCarthy's popular histories of England, her men, manners, and events. The age of Queen Anne is one of the most brilliant periods of English history—the time of Addison, Swift, Steele, Boling broke, and the great Marlborough. Anne was the second daughter of James II. She came to the throne in 1702, on the death of William III., and died in 1714. The McCarthy histories begin, in point of time, with this Life of Anne; then follow A history of the Four Georges and of William IV., and A history of our own times, which ends with Queen Victoria's Golden Jubilee.

McCarthy, Justin Huntly. If I were king. N. Y., R. H. Russell, 1901. c. 4-265 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.

A novel founded on an episode of French history, namely the love story of Francois Villon, poet, and Katherine Vaucelles, kinswoman of King Louis XI. Most of the characters are first seen in the Fircone tavern. Villon incurs the displeasure of Louis, and is condemned to death; but is later pardoned by that monarch; this scene is one of the most dramatic in a story notable for striking situations and unconventional scenes.

"It is," says the author, "with the application of higher criticism to the book of Deuteronomy that we are especially concerned." As a result of the labors of a century on the part of German writers mostly rationalists, a theory of the origin and structure of the Pentateuch has been evolved which meets with the general approval of those who deny that Moses was its author. This theory is called the analytical theory because of the peculiar analysis of the Pentateuch. The present volume discusses the authorship of Deuteronomy and briefly outlines the theory advanced by rationalists.

Mackinnon, Ja. The growth and decline of the French monarchy. N. Y., Longmans, Green & Co., 1902. 20+840 p. O. cl., $7.50.

This volume has grown out of the author's desire to investigate the origins of the French Revolution. He has not aimed at writing a disquisition on the institutions of monarchic France. It is of government in connection with contemporary history that he has treated. The growth of the monarchy is portrayed from the days of Hugh Capet onward, until it reached its climax in the reign of Louis XIV. From the latter part of the reign to the end of that of Louis XV. the writer treats of its decline. Bibliographies are appended to each chapter.

"Sister Beatrice" is a miracle play, in which the image of the Holy Virgin becomes endowed with life and takes up and performs in a marvellous manner the duties of Sister Beatrice, who has deserted her post for love of Prince Bellidor. "Ardiane and Barbe Bleue" is a poetical rendering of the story of the familiar hero-villain Bluebeard, in which Ardiane, the sixth wife, finds and releases from their dungeon her five predecessors and leaves them with Barbe Bleue.

Major, C:, ["Edwin Caskoden," pseud.] Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall; il. by Howard Chandler Christy. N. Y., Macmillan, 1902. [Ap.] c. 369 p. D. cl., $1.50.

The author of "When knighthood was in flower" revives in his latest novel an incident of the Elizabethan era, namely, the elopement of John Manners and Dorothy Vernon. In this story Mr. Major's happy faculty of surrounding his characters with an atmosphere of reality is very much in evidence. The reader could almost imagine he was in the living presence of Mary Stuart, Leicester, Rizzio, England's virgin Queen, and other famous personages whose adventures are chronicled.

"The aim of this volume has been, not alone to embody the facts, recondite and familiar, in Thoreau's life and environment, but also to estimate his rank and services as naturalist and author, judged by the comparative standards of this new century. In illustrative quotations from Thoreau's own pages, the purpose has been to choose less familiar passages, for a careful study of his writings has discovered many overlooked and self-revelatory sentences."—From "A foreword."

†Mason, Alfred E: Woodley. The four feathers. N. Y., Macmillan, 1902. c. 1901, 1902. [O.] 7+400 p. D. cl., $1.50.
The scene is the Soudan War, and the tale is one of love and heroism. The hero, an imaginative young officer, disgraces himself by resigning from his regiment when it is on the point of being ordered to war, concealing his advance knowledge of the order. Three fellow officers, hearing the truth, send him with their cards three white feathers. The box is opened in the presence of his fiancée, who adds a fourth. How he redeems himself and wins back the heroine the reader is left to discover.

"The Assassins" was a military and religious order in Syria, founded in Persia by Hassan Ben Sabbah about 1090. The followers were remarkable for their secret murders in blind obedience to the will of their chief, who was known as "the old man of the mountain." This is a romance of the Crusades, at which time the order was subdued. It is full of plots and counterplots, torture chambers, etc., all of which have "the old man of the mountain" with his houris, and his emissaries of death for central figures. It has likewise its love story.

Smythe. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1902. 2 v., 10+699; 16+361 p. pors. facsimiles, O. cl., $6.50 net.

An important work, undertaken with the permission and assistance of the present Comtesse d'Argenteau (Princess Montglyon), the representative of the Argenteau sovereign family, having as a nucleus the secret correspondence of the Comte de Mercy-Argenteau, who was deputed by the Empress to be the guardian of Marie Antoinette, as well as holding the post of Minister-Plenipotentiary from Vienna to the Court of France. These letters form a continuous account of the daily life of the Dauphine, afterward Queen of France, from 1770 to 1780—till the death of the Empress—and give minute descriptions of Court life, customs, dress, etc., for the private information of the Empress, but touch upon social rather than political events. The collection also includes many letters from Marie Antoinette to her mother, and from Maria Theresa.

The results of a woman's desire for fame are pictured in this story. Both Edith Glanville and her husband were entirely happy until she became inspired with literary ambition, and wrote a successful book. The argument of the story is, not that a woman should have no interests outside her home, but that she should not pursue a career at the expense of family life. The scene is in London.

A novel of modern life in London, containing much psychological analysis. Alice Durand was the daughter of a woman who had met a tragic and shameful death. The daughter, thrown upon her own resources, becomes the secretary of Anthony Versehoyle, a literary man, who later marries her in order that he may watch the effect of marriage upon her inherited temperament. The interest of the story lies in the development of these two natures worked upon by love and jealousy, and their subsequent happiness.

During a short visit to China Mr. Morsé endeavored to study more particularly the domestic ways of the people, and especially to sketch in rapid outline their rooms, kitchens, and the homely details of domestic life. His descriptions of street scenes, a Manchu drill-room, Chinese mob, street magicians, a pottery town, food, clothing, and many other details of Chinese life will be of interest to the general reader. Hasty pen and ink sketches of matters which he describes give an added value to the book and show many features of Chinese life in a new light.

Nauticus, (pseud.) The truth about the Schley case. Wash., D. C., Columbia Press, [1902.] 2-79 p. D. pap., 25 c.

An apparently impartial review of the Schley case, which while giving the Admiral all due credit for his personal bravery not only at the battle of Santiago but at all times in his long naval career, shows that his shortcomings before the battle (which the writer believes proved) were the result of long recognized faults of character—such as lack of decision of character, the ability to carry a heavy burden with wisdom, etc. Every question that came before the Court of Inquiry is taken up and discussed with great intelligence and impartiality. Evidently written by a person in authority in Washington.

"The work which is now given to the public after years of diligent preparation is not a new edition or revision of the 'International Cyclopædia.' It is not based upon that or upon any other publication. The comparatively small portion of text which has been retained unaltered from the 'International Cyclopædia' and incorporated in these volumes has been so retained because it has successfully stood the test of searching criticism, and because the editors regard it as satisfying the most exacting requirements. This, however, is the full extent of the new encyclopædia's obligation to the old. The present work has been planned and executed as a wholly independent and original undertaking. It represents the practical knowledge gained from an editorial experience of many years. It embodies the results derived from a critical study of all the most famous works of reference which have at any time appeared in Europe or in the United States."—Preface.

"This little book—the product of the scanty leisure of five years—does not profess to be written in the spirit of cold, rigid impartiality. It expresses the point of view of a frank admirer of John Brown's character and career. At the same time it contains no conscious evasion of difficulties, nor perversion of detrimental facts. Every care has been taken to arrive at the exact facts on disputed points, and to state those facts clearly. As far as the writer knows, nothing but the truth is told, but it is 'the truth told lovingly.'"—Preface.

Nicolls, W: Jasper. Graystone: a novel. Phil., Lippincott, 1902. [Mr1.] c. 6-338 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.

An attractive love story is evolved through a series of romantic episodes, whose background is found in a suburb of Philadelphia. A young girl and her aunt rent Graystone, an old-fashioned house in this suburb, from its owner, a middle-aged ex-army officer. A mutual affection is the result, which has many misunderstandings and disappointments before it runs its course.

"This volume is the outcome of fifteen years' interest in Russian affairs, culminating in four journeys—one of nearly 20,000 miles—in European and Asiatic Russia. In the course of these, besides a residence of some time in St. Petersburg and visits to the principal cities, I travelled in Finland, in Siberia as far as Lake Baikal, in the Causasus, and in Central Asia as far as the frontier of Kashgar. During all these journeys I was afforded opportunities of seeing and investigating every matter that interested me, and of making the acquaintance of the chief Russian administrators in every part."—Preface.

The efforts of a rich but uncultured husband and wife of Hebrew extraction to obtain an entrance into the best society of the hunting county of Trentshire, England, is the leading theme. When fair means fail them, they strike a blow at one of the families, by circulating a scandal, that has but slight basis of wrong. "The credit of the county," however, is in the end upheld, and Mr. and Mrs. Asher are obliged to move to another shire.

By the author of "Bob, son of battle." Although in a different vein from that story, the dog is still the central character; the main figures are the grim old Laird, the last of the "Stark Heriots," his fascinating child-wife, and "Danny" the dog, the idol of the mistress as well as of the retainers.

Olston, Albert B. Mind power and privileges. N. Y., T: Y. Crowell & Co, [1902.] [S.] c. 20+406 p. D. cl., $1.50 net.

The author's purpose is "to give to the general public the necessary evidence of the mind's power over the functions and conditions of the body, and to teach the reader how to avail himself of the resources of his mind. The evidence given is not from the testimonial side at all, but from the science of anatomy, histology, physiology, and psychology. Were we to dedicate this book, it would be dedicated to all who are open-minded, and seeking the highest fruition of the laws of their being."

Oman, C: W: Chadwick. A history of the Peninsular war. v. 1, 1807-1809; from the treaty of Fontainebleau to the battle of Corunna. N. Y., [Oxford Univ. Press,] (Amer. Branch,) 1902. 15+656 p. pors. maps, plans, O. cl., $4.75.

Since Napier's "Peninsular war" was published some sixty years ago, an enormous bulk of valuable material has been accumulating in English, French, and Spanish, which has practically remained unutilized. Chiefly does the writer consider himself indebted to the papers of the diplomatist Sir Charles Vaughan. New matter and a new interpretation of many events are the principal qualities of this exhaustive work.

The story opens with an introduction to Enoch Strone, mechanic and practical engineer in a factory in one of the English shire towns. Though self taught, he is a man of power. His spare time is spent upon a labor saving machine which he has invented, and which finally makes him rich. He then enters Parliament, makes an unfortunate marriage while loving another woman. The denouement is unexpected.

The heroine, a reduced gentlewoman, finds herself compelled to earn a living in a London workshop. By accident she meets a great scientist who persuades her to submit to a scientific experiment, which involves the risk of her life. The result is a remarkable effacing much of her past from her memory. She becomes in fact another person, and enters into a new life.

The scenes are laid in France and England of to-day, unrolling before the reader a panorama of modern France. A French mob is shown wildly excited and clamoring for the destruction of the enemies of its beloved army and ripe for revolution under the guidance of the first daring leader. The characters are a French general, several fair women, an inventor of a submarine boat, etc. Love and adventure are the chief themes.

†Pemberton, Max. The house under the sea: a romance. N. Y., Appleton, 1902. [S.] c. 7+346 p. D. cl., $1.50.
A tale of a mad Hungarian count, who has taken possession of some lonely South Sea islands of volcanic origin—islands that at irregular intervals exhale strange, poisonous vapors, which drive men to madness, or stupefy them. To escape these vapors the mad count builds himself a refuge under the sea. His business on these islands is to lure vessels on to a dangerous reef, killing the crew and taking possession of the cargo. The story abounds in slaughter and other horrors.

Thirty-three letters addressed to Percy's father, the first Duke of Northumberland, the Rev. Thomas Percy, compiler of the "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," General Harvey, Henry Reveley, and others. The peculiar position in English politics occupied by Percy is well known to students of American history, as is also his disaccord with the measures leading to the American war. The letters, which were first discovered in the library of Alnwick Castle, by the Rev. E: G. Porter, of Lexington, Mass., in 1878, contain comments upon men and events that add substantially to our stock of Revolutionary history. The letters have been carefully edited and supplied with an introduction and notes. The frontispiece has been specially etched by Sidney L. Smith.

These volumes represent a series of lectures prepared to give, in a simple and condensed form, the development of architectural styles in France, and a history of her great monuments. The subject of French architecture naturally divides itself into two parts; one devoted to the Gothic, and the other to the Renaissance style. Under the first are grouped the great cathedrals, and under the second the palaces and chateaux of France. The later history which associated itself with the great monuments of France is given, and also some account of the peoples whose early migrations founded and moulded the nations. The volumes are profusely illustrated with full-page pictures.

Isadas Pacha, Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, from Abdullulah Zobeir, Emperor of Abaria, dying leaves to his physician, Dr. Marillier, "the insane root," a mandregora root, enclosed in a small box. Marillier, a suitor of Rachel, the beautiful ward of the Pacha, envies Ruel Bey, his favored rival. Learning from the papers left by the Pacha that the mandrake root has marvellous powers, Marillier succeeds in assuming the body of Ruel who has been accidentally killed. On this change of identities the strange story turns.

A manual, for colleges and normal schools. Contains specific directions for the dissection of thirty-four invertebrate animals. The object of the course is to teach comparative anatomy, and this end is kept constantly in view. Each of the larger groups of invertebrates is presented as a whole, so that, by thus avoiding too much emphasis upon the detached types of the different groups, the student has his attention constantly directed to the structural features which characterize the entire group under consideration.

The addresses are the outcome of resolutions passed at the meeting of the General Assembly at Minneapolis, Minn., May, 1899, when it was agreed upon by a specially appointed committee to set aside a memorial fund, to be known as the Twentieth century fund. The purpose of the fund being the endowment of Presbyterian, academic, collegiate and theological institutions. The furtherance of this object was to be attained by the publication of appropriate literature. The historical development of Presbyterianism is the subject of most of the discussions, which are by eminent divines.

An American business man, a wholesale dealer in tanners' supplies, has a strange two-sided nature, of business and poetry. A long cherished plan to visit Italy finds realization through a chance legacy of five thousand dollars. In Italy he has wonderful adventures. Captured by brigands, he wins them by his courage, refuses to ransom himself, and is actually made chief of the brigands. Thereupon he places the band and its operations upon a business basis the result being most amusing complications.

A phase of Welsh life is portrayed, which is fast passing away. The "witch" is introduced as a girl of fifteen, wild, ill-clad, uneducated, driven out of doors by the harshness of a drunken father and the brutality of his farm servants, hooted and stoned as a witch by the village children, but finding life and solace in the open air and sky, the fields, the sea, and the affection of her dog and other animals. Her development into a most lovable creature, through her love for a handsome young farmer, who is kind to her, is most interesting.

"An earlier volume of the series was devoted to the subject of apostolic christianity. The present narrative proposes to contemplate the life, growth, and influence of what, as distinguished from mediæval and later developments, is called the early Catholic church. The period in view is nearly that which has been named the Patristic. It has also been denominated, but not perhaps very happily, the period of christianity under its antique and classical form." —Introduction.

The author's first work on the subject of the authorship of Shakespeare, entitled "Bacon vs. Shak-spere. Brief for Plaintiff," published in 1897, and now in its eighth edition, is mainly devoted to the historical evidence pertinent to the case, indirect and circumstantial as the evidences necessarily are. The second volume, "Francis Bacon, our Shake-speare," deals with internal criticism, and shows the philosophic purpose for which the plays were written. In his third volume, "Bacon and Shake-spear parallelisms," Mr. Reed rests the argument for Bacon on the sole author of Shakespeare's poems and plays on a single point, viz., identity of thought and diction between them and his acknowledged works.

Mr. Richman's work is much more than the history, in part, of one of the American commonwealths. It is, in fact, a critical survey of events holding the stage in a particular commonwealth, but of world-wide significance; events fraught with the two leading principles of modern civilization—freedom of conscience in religion and the rights of man in politics. For this reason the book becomes important in the field of general history. It reveals, step by step, the way in which democracy, in the modern sense, became established.

The book will be found useful also to teachers who wish a thorough preparation in American history, or helpful suggestions in methods of teaching the subject. The "library" and "source" methods have been combined, and complete references given in connection with each topic. The book contains topical outlines together with research questions leading to close analysis and original investigation and thought. The aim has been to present the subject in such a way as to cultivate the judgment and not merely the memory. Full directions as to notebook and map work have been given.

Investigates the elusive mental conditions of a strangely complex character. From materials gathered at Salt Lake City and elsewhere during eight years, there is now presented both Smith's checkered career and his pedigree for five generations. Here certain suppressed sources disclose the transmission of erratic tendencies, while his environment and bodily conditions account for the young prophet's visions. The Book of Mormon, as a "Record of the American Indians," is traced to the boy's imaginative gifts and his life on the Western Frontier.

Dr. Rizal is the most striking character to be found in the history of the Philippine Islands. His best known work, "Noli me tangere," of which this is an abridgment, was written in 1887. It is a vivid picture of life in the Philippines; its exposure of Spanish misrule and oppression won for the author the bitter hatred of the friars and inspired the relentless persecution which only ended with the taking of his life on December 30, 1896.

The incidents of the novel grow out of a bet made by a German newspaper man, that he will spend a year as a farm hand among the peasants of Styria, his aim being to prove his theory that the peasant is a man of cleaner morals than the city man. He obtains a situation, after considerable experience in tramping, on a farm, and it is his daily letters from here to his editor-in-chief that make the book.

There are said to be only two actual attempts to deal with the whole subject in existence, and Professor Saintsbury was for nearly thirty years employed in picking up for himself and piecing together the greater and lesser classics of the subject. The first volume is, he says, "an attempt to supply for others, on the basis of these years of reading, the atlas of which the writer himself so sorely felt the need." It presents an account of the higher rhetoric and poetic, the theory and practice of literary criticism and taste, during ancient and mediæval times; while the present volume deals with the matter from the Renaissance to the death of eighteenth-century classicism. The third volume will be on modern criticism.

A novel dealing with heredity. The scene is laid chiefly in Paris. The hero falls in love with the photograph of a woman. He is just thirty. The original of the portrait was nineteen when the picture was taken, but more than twenty years have passed. He finds her. Of the four chief characters —two men and two women—it is difficult to say which is the most interesting, or to tell till near the close to whom "the rescue" refers.

"This account of the feudal régime forms the first chapter in the second volume of the 'Histoire générale du IV. Siecle à nos Jours,' edited by M. M. Lavisse and Rambaud. It is now done into English in the hope that it may be useful as a short description of the social organization prevailing in Europe, especially from the tenth to the thirteenth century. It seems particularly fitted for collateral reading in high school and college classes in history, and at the same time it may prove of interest outside the schools."—Preface.

The aim of the American editor has been to fit the French work to American class-room use. Some slight additions have been made. The original work was carried only through the reign of Theodosius I. The period from that time to Charlemagne has been treated in four new chapters. Some omissions also have been made to bring the work into a certain compass. To each chapter has been appended a short list of sources in English. In appendix is a list of sources (5 p.) Index.

Sheldon, F: Martin. The practical colorist: a pathfinder for the artist printer. Burlington, Vt., The Owl Press, [1902.] c. 238 p. il. Q. cl., $8.
"This book is not a text-book on the science of lights and color. Only that of vital interest to the color printer has been taken from the science of chromatics; much of this science having been purposely omitted, that nothing should be introduced which could possibly tend to mistify or hinder. The laws governing the technique of color printing have been simply and plainly stated, and illustrated and even repeated in order to fix them indelibly upon the mind. . . . In fact, the book, from beginning to end, is one earnest plea, by precept and illustration, for simple, plain, neat and readable type and color effects."—Preface.

Consists of a series of experimental studies in the domain of abnormal mental life followed along the lines of pathological individual psychology. The facts of mental dissociation and degeneration are closely studied in interesting individual cases with important, theoretical, and practical results. The field of research is new and important in the domain of psychic life, normal or abnormal. The subject is of interest, not only to the psychiatrist and neurologist, but also to the psychologist and to the general reader who takes an interest in the phenomena of abnormal mental life.

Simpson, Carnegie. Love never faileth: an emotion touched by moralities. N. Y. and Chic., Revell, [1902.] [Ap.] c. 3-205 D. cl., $1.25.

St. Paul's text is the keynote of a novel of shifting scenes and unconventional characters. The hero is an artist and the heroine a tourist. They meet in Rosenwald, and of course fall in love; here a mercenary father intervenes, but eventually love prevails and there is an unlooked for ending to the story.

The author's purpose has been to show clearly the social conditions of the prosperous class in New York during the period sometimes known as "The golden age of New York," which extended from the accession of George I. till the outbreak of the Revolution. The work is richly illustrated from photographs taken from real artistic objects in silver, glass, etc., owned by old families and is divided into seven parts: Aspects of the small town; Houses and furniture; Table furnishings; Costumes of men; The dress of women; Amusements; Manners, food and culture.

A continuation, in a measure, of the author's former volume of "Great pictures." It aims to represent several great painters who did not appear in the first volume, such as Crivelli, Luini, Giorgione, Moroni, Landseer, Mantegna and Perugino, who were left out of "Great pictures" for lack of space. The pictures in this series are not only paintings with great reputations, but each one is a painting of the very first rank. The text is from the pens of the most famous writers of all countries.

In this work, which is a compilation of views and impressions of the British metropolis, the compiler has in some measure followed the plan of her former work on Paris in selecting from a vast number of works descriptions of such external characteristics of the city as are recorded by travellers and famous native and foreign writers. The selections deal largely with general impressions of various sections of the great city—however there will be found descriptions of many of the chief monuments, the streets, the squares, the parks, the old churches and civic buildings with associations, besides much interesting historical matter.

Oliver Horn is a young Southerner who comes to New York, just before the Civil War, to seek his fortune. After many vicissitudes, he is able to follow his inclination to study art, and becomes an artist of note. Bohemian and artistic life of thirty years ago, when social New York did not extend far above Union Square, are vividly sketched with both pathos and humor. A Southern gentleman of the old-fashioned type is presented in Oliver's father —a dreamy, impractical inventor, whose fortune is only realized when on his death-bed. Northern and Southern characters are well contrasted.

An earl's son after gambling away all his means, kills a man in a drunken brawl and just as he is escaping from justice meets his lady love, also an earl's daughter, who flies with him. They are privately married and then travel through the finest country of England, meeting with all kinds of adventures until all ends happily. Full of the highest spirits and a total disregard of conventionality.

"The study here undertaken was suggested by a conversation two years ago, on the problems arising from the recent acquisition of our insular possessions, in which it was emphasized that there is one clause of the Constitution of the United States—the clause by which Congress is given power 'to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States'—to which the Supreme Court has never attached a definite and certain meaning."—Preface. The author believes this clause expresses the true principles of the administration of dependencies.

Commerce in November, 1901, to institute a searching inquiry, uninfluenced by partisan consideration, into the causes of the alarming increase of gambling and the social evil in New York, and to collect such evidence as might establish the connection between existing conditions and those who, in the last analysis, are responsible for these conditions. The committee was assisted by Alvin S. Johnson, Instructor in Economics at Bryn Mawr College. The work is divided into two parts, the first treating of the problem of prostitution; regulation in general and in Paris, Berlin and other cities of Europe; the sanitary and the moral aspect of modern regulation; probable effectiveness of regulation in New York, etc. The second part contains the recommendations of the committee which are strongly against segregating prostitutes in separate quarters of the city.

"Racer of Illinois" transfers the activities of "Jack Racer" to a larger and more important field than the little prairie town of the earlier work. With the courage of ignorance and the buoyance of youth Jack ranges himself against a big railroad corporation, choosing the state senate as a suitable arena. There he learns much of politics and other things. The incidents include village "moonshining," a prairie fire, and an incursion into fashionable life in New York.

The story is told by Giles Henry Anderton, journalist, who is apparently wrecked in a southern sea. After hours of insensibility he awakens in a strange land called "Intermere." This beautiful country he is told is within the mundane sphere but inhabited by a people infinitely in advance of our race—"a people who, by evolutionary processes, have unlocked a large proportion of the secrets of nature and the universe, and turning them to ennobling ends not to selfish purposes." He spends some time in "Intermere," investigating its customs, laws, government, etc.

†Terhune, Everit Bogert. Michel Gulpe; il. by Sidney Marsh Chase. N. Y., G: W. Dillingham Co., [1902.] [Ag.] c. 3-182 p. D. cl., $1.25.

The scene is a little town in France, not far from Poitiers. Michel Gulpe, the character around whom the story is woven, is a tobacconist. His little shop is avoided by the superstitious folk of the village, to whom he has become a "bogey man." The author wins his confidence, and writes out his story. Michel is a staunch follower of the old Eastern religions, and a devoted worshipper of Brahma. He believes in the transmigration of the soul, and relates the various lives through which he has passed.

Thomson, H. C. China and the powers: a narrative of the outbreak of 1900. N. Y., Longmans, Green & Co., 1902. 12+285 p. il. O. cl., $4.

This account of the outbreak in Northern China is based for the most part upon letters, written by the author at the time and afterwards, to English papers. There is no account given of the siege of Peking and only a mere epitome of the Seymour expedition, as there have already been full narratives of both, but the writer has described at considerable length the investment and bombardment of the foreign settlements at Tientsin, and the assault and capture of the Tientsin native city.

A paper originally written for The Dial, but hitherto unprinted. Its form was probably suggested by the discourses on peace and non-resistance which in 1840 were so numerous in New England. The subject is treated under three heads: (1), Qualities of the recruit; (2), What music shall we have; (3), Not how many, but where the enemy are.

*Thwaites, Reuben Gold. Daniel Boone. N. Y., Appleton, 1902. [S.] c. 15+257 p. por. D. (Appleton's ser. of historic lives.) cl., $1 net.

Mr. Thwaites obtained the bulk of his information upon which this biography is based from the valuable material relative to Boone, gathered by the late Dr. Lyman Copeland Draper of Wisconsin, now the property of the Wisconsin State Historical Society. It had been Dr. Draper's intention to write a biography of the famous Kentucky pioneer, but he died before accomplishing his design. Mr. Thwaites presents a somewhat new view of the character and career of Boone.

The three canoe voyages recorded in this little book were undertaken in the summer of 1887. The volume itself appeared in 1890. The rivers traversed were the Rock, the Fox and the Wisconsin.

Thwaites, Reuben Gold. Farther Marquette. N. Y., Appleton, 1902. [Je.] c. 15+244 p. por. D. (Appleton's life histories.) cl., net, $1.

Slight space has been given to the ancestry of Marquette or to his early years in France. The author's chief object has been to depict the great explorer's work in the western wilderness. Whenever practicable, "Jesuit Relations" and Marquette's own journals have been freely drawn upon. It has thus been sought to convey a picture of the conditions surrounding Marquette, delineated in large measure by himself and his contemporaries.

*Untersteiner, Alfredo. A short history of music; tr. by S. C. Very. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1902. [O.] c. 8+349 p. D. cl., $1.20 net.

A history of music from the very earliest time to 1901, in which not a single name of any importance in its whole history has been omitted. The chapter on the history of the art of singing is unique; the development of the science of music, the history of our scales, and the development of the orchestra are treated briefly and yet so clearly that the merest tyro in matters musical will find little difficulty in following the thought of the author.

Frederik Van Eeden is one of the most distinguished living Dutch writers. Like Tolstoy and Görki he concerns himself with the more intimate truths of life. The present work tells the life-history of Hedwig Marga de Fontayne. It traces the evolution of the soul of a woman with a singularly daring realism, but a realism marked by a moral significance. The story is a study of the inner life, a tragedy of temperament and circumstances.

In reading Roman history the writer was strongly impressed "with the almost certain incident to the imperial office of a death by violent means." Further he says, "Curiously tracing this so-called 'imperial disease' to its origin, I finally discovered it, as it seemed to me, in the introduction among the Romans by the Empress Livia Augusta of the dreadful crime of domestic murder." After descending again from Livia to Nero, and exploring the fate of all who bore the cognomen of Cæsar, the conclusion seems irresistible to him that the violent death which awaited so large a proportion of the Roman emperors is to be accounted for not alone by the license of the times, but in no small degree by the existence of a veritable disease having its origin in the house of Cæsar itself. Copiously illustrated from antique statuary, etc. Printed at the Merrymount Press.

One of the few sixteenth-century English dramas still inaccessible in modern type. It is a morality play with a peculiar historical interest. It is a Reformation drama on the Protestant side, like most of the moralities, with a combined moralistic and doctrinal design, and it presents most of the morality devices, including the vice in its fullest development.

Waggaman, Mary T. Bob o' Link. N. Y., Benziger Bros., 1902. c. 3-139 p. il. D. cl., 40 c.

Tells of one Barbara Lynn, familiarly known as "Bob o' Link," who can climb and shoot and ride and swim better than any boy; who leads a life outdoors all the year round.

Waggaman, Mary T. Corinne's vow. N. Y., Benziger Bros., 1902. c. 1901. 3-144 p. D. cl., $1.25.

Corinne Meredith is a pretty American girl of eighteen, living with her young step-mother and half-sister at a French seaport town. The step-mother dies of consumption, but before dying extracts a vow from Corinne to be a mother to her young sister, and to sacrifice everything in life for her. The girl's father is reported lost at sea on his way to France, and his business a failure. Left penniless and friendless in a strange land, they have sad experiences, through which their religious training bravely supports them. For Catholic readers.

"In this volume the author has made the effort to portray Napoleon as he appears to an average man. Archives have not been rummaged, new sources of information have not been discovered; the author merely claims to have used such authorities, old and new, as are accessible to any diligent student. No attempt has been made to give a full and detailed account of Napoleon's life or work. To do so would have required the labor of a decade, and the result would be almost a library. The author has tried to give to the great Corsican his proper historical position, his true rating as a man and a ruler—together with a just estimate of his achievements."—Preface.

†Webster, H: Kitchell. Roger Drake, Captain of industry. N. Y., Macmillan, 1902. [O.] c. 4+306 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.

The formation of a copper mining trust is the basis of this story. The hero, Roger Drake, tells his own romance which carries him through his struggles and adventures in a Western mining town. The plot moves between New York social life and the scene of the story's action at the mines. The two partners in the story are rivals for the same girl, a business complication of far reaching consequence to the development of the plot.

†Wells, Herbert G: The sea lady. N. Y., Appleton, [1902.] [S.] c. 4+300 p. il. D. cl., $1.50.
A wildly imaginative story told in sober earnest of a lovely mermaid who came ashore, shamming cramp, at Sandgate, England, to the astonishment of the bathers. She thereupon makes herself at home with the Bunting family, appearing in a bath chair in public, and proves an altogether irresistible young person, even to the extent of winning the affection of a young man already engaged, inasmuch as she is both pretty and entertaining. But having no soul and no morals and having a tail, she eventually returns to the sea, though, however, not alone.

The general scope and tenor of these essays have been influenced by the ideas which the author had at the time of their inception. When he first attempted the study of passenger traffic of railways, he was moved by the consideration that not only had scant attention been given to the subject, but also that the transportation of freight took precedence to passenger transportation.

The present issue of the [English] Reference Catalogue of Current Literature is even bulkier than its immediate forerunner, and contains the complete or abridged lists of one hundred and seventy-nine publishers. A notable fact is the increase in colonial and foreign houses who have inserted their catalogues, thus further enhancing the utility of the publication. The Index now extends to seven hundred and ninety-eight pages, containing an aggregate of one hundred and thirty-five thousand entries, an increase on that of the last edition of two hundred and twenty-two pages, and comprising nearly thirty-eight thousand additional references. Every book contained in the "Reference Catalogue" will be found in the Index, under title, subject and author.

and continued to the year 1902. Bost., Ginn, 1902. c. '95, 1902. 14+474 p. D. cl., $1.65.

The first edition of this work was prepared to meet a popular demand for information on the money question in the presidential campaign of 1896. The progress of events, of legislation, and of public opinion, however, during the past seven years, suggested revision and addition. While following the general historical plan of the first edition, and adopting its text in part, the author has practically rewritten the book, adding several new chapters, expunging controversial and other matter that has become obsolete, and bringing the whole down to date. It has been his aim to adapt it more particularly to the use of the class room. To this end he has added a brief recapitulation, and a list of authorities, to each chapter.

About reconstruction times a scheming New England judge eloped with a high bred Southern girl. The hatred which the Southern people thereafter felt for the judge, is reflected later in their attitude to his daughter, who is, according to the parable quoted in the story, "As a speckled bird, the birds round about are against her."

This romance of Westmoreland introduces American readers to a fresh and characteristic local English field that abounds in quaint and delightful features, vividly set forth. The romances of the poor and proud "T'bacca queen" and her more fortunate cousin, the results which follow the remarkable will of Richard Carrodus, and the quaint child-life and curious characters of the "Fellsiders," are admirably pictured in the course of a story distinguished by its sustained interest as well as by its wealth of local color.

In that aggregation of human beings termed a state, the need is readily perceived of a power that shall adjust the various relations which must exist among persons composing that body. That power is termed "Government." In order that government shall act for the best interests of the people, an understanding of the character of the people of a state is imperative. The moral and physical characteristics of a people thus become an important preliminary study in political science. This treatise will help to awaken an interest in political science, and will spread a knowledge of its principles.

A study by a group of experienced settlement workers, men and women, of the round of life in the North and West Ends, the two principal immigrant districts of Boston. These districts, until about fifteen years ago, were inhabited chiefly by an Irish population. Since that time there has been a large influx of Jews and Italians. Twenty-five different nationalities are here represented, including a considerable number of negroes. The book shows the general relation existing between these districts and other parts of the city.

A story entirely devoted to dogs. The central figure is Waddles, the rabbit hound, the redoubtable "House fourfeet" of "Tommy-Anne." The book contains the account of his meeting with Cadence, the beagle with ancestors, and the promotion from the regions of kennel life to be his mate. Besides his active life, there are stories of other dogs. Though some of the characters of "Tommy-Anne" and "Wabeno" reappear in "Dogtown" it is a book complete in itself.

A simple story of a young girl's life. Rosamond Courtney is the only daughter of rich Catholic parents. She has been educated at a convent. On the day she graduates she begs her mother to let her remain in her convent home and become a nun. Her mother indignantly refuses her request, her chief desire being that her daughter shall make a great marriage. Rosamond is taken into society and persuaded to marry an Englishman with a title who turns out to be a criminal. Other sad experiences follow her through life till she at last finds peace.

Young, C: A: Manual of astronomy: a text-book. Bost., Ginn, 1902. c. 7+611 p. il. O. hf. leath., $2.45.

Prepared in response to a demand for a class-room text-book intermediate between the author's "General astronomy" and his "Elements of astronomy." The former is found to be too bulky for convenient use in the curriculum of many institutions, while the latter is too meagre, and does not sufficiently utilize the mathematical knowledge possessed by the pupils when they naturally take up astronomy. The manual is largely made up of material drawn from the earlier books, but rearranged, rewritten when necessary, and added to, in order to suit it to its purpose, and bring it thoroughly down to date.

Abruzzi, (Duke of the,) [Luigi Amedeo of Savoy.] On the Polar Star in the Arctic sea, by His Royal Highness, Luigi Amedeo of Savoy, Duke of the Abruzzi; with the statements of Commander U. Cagni upon the sledge expedition to 86° 34′ north and of Dr. A. Cavalli Molinelli upon his return to the Bay of Teplitz; tr. by W: Le Queux. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1903. 2 v., 16+346+6; 345-702+6 p. il. pors. maps, Q. cl., $12.50 net.

The object of the expedition of the Polar Star was to sail as far to the north as possible along some coast-line, and then to travel on sledges towards the Pole from the place where the winter had been passed. The Pole was not reached, but the sledge expedition, led by Commander Cagni, pushed on to a latitude which no man had previously attained, and proved that with determination and sturdy men, and a number of well-selected dogs, the frozen Arctic Ocean can actually be crossed to the highest latitude. These two very handsome volumes, profusely illustrated from photographs, give an account of the whole expedition by the explorers themselves. The expedition started in 1899 on a four years' cruise.

Abu'l-Ala. The quatrains of Abu'l-Ala; selected from his "Lozum-ma-la Yalzam" and "Sact-uz-Zind," now first rendered into English by Ameen F. Rihani. N. Y., Doubleday, Page & Co., 1903. [S.] c. 20+144 p. D. cl., $1.25 net.

Abu'l-Ala, "the rediscovered forerunner of 'Omar Khayyam,'" was an Arab poet and philosopher born in 974 A.D. The quatrains now for the first time translated into English contain the ideas of a man who was one of the foremost thinkers of his time, and who inculcated religious tolerance and kindness to animals when such sentiments were almost unknown. The translator claims that the devout Mohammedans suppressed his writings for nearly one thousand years because of their heresies. An Arabic edition first appeared in Cairo in 1891. A biographic sketch prefaces the volume.

Adamson, W:, D.D. The life of Joseph Parker, pastor of City Temple, London. N. Y. and Chic., Revell, [1903.] 16+387 p. il. por. O. cl., $1.75 net.

This biography is not the product of a few months' hasty work. The author gives us the fruit of many years of preparation, in a careful, mature and authoritative work. In writing the life of Joseph Parker, Dr. Adamson has lifted the veil from much more than a series of facts and deeds. Long and intimate personal intercourse and friendship has qualified him in a peculiar degree to put in the forefront the forces in Dr. Parker's unique character, wherein lay the secret of his influence, power and success. The elements of romance and humor, together with anecdote and illustration which give a biography a vivid human interest, are skilfully interwoven with the narrative. While fully accomplishing his primary object, Dr. Adamson has made his book illuminating and informing on the religious history of England during the period he covers.

"The aim of this book is to give the materials for the inductive study of English verse. Its origin was in certain university courses, for which it proved to be necessary—often for use in a single hour's work—to gather almost numberless books, some of which must ordinarily be inaccessible except in the vicinity of large libraries. I have tried to extract from these books the materials necessary for the study of English verse-forms, adding notes designed to make the specimens intelligible and useful."—Preface.

Allen, Ja. Lane. The mettle of the pasture. N. Y., Macmillan, 1903. [Jl10.] c. 448 p. 12°, †$1.50.

Kentucky is the scene; character sketching the strong point. The point at issue is "What should be the mettle of this great American pasture"? The story seems to dwell upon truthfulness as the virtue which should mark the American throughout the world. The hero tells the whole truth to the girl who has promised to marry him. She recoils and leaves him. After experience has done its work she comes back to the old truth that love can condone all past sin provided the sinner is now influenced by high aims and purposes. A grandmother, an old judge and an "old maid" play important parts.

A critical examination of the applicability to consciousness of the ideas of structure and function leads to certain limitations upon the use of these terms current in biology. In psychology the two conceptions are shown to involve phases simply of single events. Functional psychology is then shown to merge inevitably with the philosophical disciplines, e.g., ethics, logic, æsthetics, etc.

About 1836 a young Canadian girl fell in love with her Russian music teacher, who was supposed to be a poor exile. After travelling about with her father in the hope of forgetting her lover, during which time she saw Queen Victoria crowned, etc., she finally married the Russian, who turned out a rich count and an ideal husband and father. The book deals chiefly with her daughter's love history. She loved and married a Canadian minister, but her mother's ambition almost ruined her happiness.

Many facts and some fiction make a connected story of the happy girlhood of Josephine de la Pagerie in her wildly beautiful tropical home in the West Indies. The terrible storms and volcanoes of Martinique bring about some of the incidents of the plot. As a girl of fifteen it was prophesied to Josephine that she should be Empress of the French. The compact between France and the just-born American Republic and the influence of Benjamin Franklin at Paris are skilfully used. The story ends with Josephine's engagement to Beauharnais.

Baker, Ernest A. A descriptive guide to the best fiction, British and American; including translations from foreign languages; containing about 4500 references; with copious indexes and a historical appendix. N. Y., Macmillan, 1903. 5+610 p. O. cl., $2.50.

A careful and very interesting selected catalogue of English prose fiction, in which the books of today find very full representation. Every title is followed by a note. While the annotator has not sought to appraise the literary value of all the books dealt with, the aim having been to subordinate criticism to description—still literary criticism does enter into the writer's selections and observations, a thoroughly helpful guide not being possible otherwise. Masterpieces and peculiarly representative works are indicated by an asterisk. The authors are given alphabetically by nationalities and periods of time; the books follow authors chronologically as to date of publication. The historical appendix, which embraces some children's books, is most useful, as are the carefully compiled "Authors and title index" and "Subjects index." Mr. Baker is editor of "Half-forgotten books" and Librarian of Midland Railway Institute, Derby, England.

Barry, J: Daniel. The congressman's wife: a story of American politics; il. by Rollin G. Kirby. N. Y., Smart Set Publishing Co., 1903. c. 10-359 p. D. cl., $1.50.

The story of a New York congressmen, who, with a salary of five thousand dollars, lives at the rate of thirty thousand a year. The scene is Washington, the story opening with a dinner and ball given by Douglas Briggs in his magnificent new house. His political opponents accuse him of being in the pay of a great railroad corporation, and the scandal comes to his wife's ears, a beautiful woman with a New England conscience. She takes him to task, refusing to live with him if the story is true. The outcome is unexpected, and is evolved through good scenes from political and social life.

Bell, L: The art of illumination. N. Y., McGraw Publishing Co., 1902. c. 4–345 p. O. cl., $2.50.

A study of the utilization of artificial light. It is intended to deal, not with the problem of distributing illuminants, but with their application, and treats of the illuminants themselves only in so far as a knowledge of their peculiarities is necessary to their intelligent use. To compress the subject within reasonable bounds, it has been necessary to discuss general principles rather than concrete examples of artificial lighting.

Benson, Blackwood K. Old Squire: the romance of a black Virginian. N. Y., Macmillan, 1903. [Ap.] c. 8+431 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
A story of the Civil War as seen from the Confederate side. "Old Squire" is an old negro slave, loyally devoted to his master, who is in the Confederate cavalry; his quick wit in helping his master and his faithfulness to the very end are finely drawn. There is another typical negro character, "Barney," who guides the Union column to victory in 1864; he is offered as a foil to "Old Squire." The author says the object of his book is—"not to defend slavery—but to do justice to slaves."

These journals of the great Prussian Field-Marshal were written by him to serve as notes for further memoirs. Although, therefore, they do not claim to be in any way complete works, they present so vivid and interesting a picture of the daily work and thought of the famous chief of the staff that they form a valuable record of the stirring times to which they relate.

Professor Lennox, in search of a quiet place to complete some great work, travels with his daughter to some of the beautiful summer resorts of Southern Germany and Switzerland at the close of the vacation season. Here they meet Christian Thal, a remarkable young pianist, the protegé of a disappointed Hungarian prima-donna, whose whole life is spent for his music. Juliet Lennox becomes his inspiration while her father "stands apart and thinks for the world." The signora's jelaousy brings about the plot.

The letters composing this volume were written by the Baroness Bonde to a friend in London during the time of the French Revolution of 1848. Their writer, one of the most accomplished and charming women of the last century, was the daughter of Sir Richard Robinson, of Rokeby in Ireland, and during a residence in Paris of thirty years (1819-1849), knew most of the leading statesmen of the time and attained an intimate knowledge of French politics during that tumultuous period.

"Its object is to place in the hands of the young cavalry officer one volume embracing the duties and responsibilities which confront him from the moment he joins his troop, and to make clear to him how things are done in the cavalry service. The author has consulted all the professional works pertaining to the cavalry horse and his pack that were within reach, and to this has added the results of his own observations during ten years of cavalry service. Besides is a vast amount of information obtained from those older cavalry officers who have made our cavalry service all that it is."—Preface. Books consulted (2 p.).

Jake Schakelton in the early fifties became a Mormon to marry a second wife. With the two women he travelled across the Nevada desert in an emigrant wagon. His first wife's boy of three dies; a baby is born, a horse dies. The man strikes a mining camp and sells his sick wife and baby for a pair of good horses. A gentleman miner marries the woman and adopts the child. Jake Schakelton after twenty-five years, a bonanza king and owner of a great San Francisco newspaper, hears of Mariposa Moreau and her wonderful voice and offers her the means to cultivate it. He knows she is his daughter. The "tangles" make a stirring plot.

Waiving the improbability of a modern Virginia gentleman marrying a veiled lady and letting her leave immediately and study for "a career triumphant" on the stage, the story is true to life in many details. Impoverished Virginia after the Civil War is the scene and a delightful spendthrift family furnishes the characters. An old uncle wishing to leave property to his nephew insists upon his marrying an unknown girl. She consents to give the rest of her life provided she may first study acting and singing for ten years. The details of the plot are full of surprises.

Boone, H: Burnham, and Brown, Kenneth. The Redfields succession: a novel. N. Y., Harper, 1903. [My.] c. 4+318 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The scenes of this story are laid chiefly in Virginia, and give an accurate and entertaining account of Virginia country life. The principal characters are a Southern girl and an impecunious New Yorker, who is a fine fellow at bottom and descendant of an old Virginia family. There is an exciting contest over the will made by his uncle, who owned the handsome estate of Redfields, and there are many turns in the plot before the final dénouement.

Mrs. Booth aims to enlist sympathy and aid for the helpless men who when they regain liberty are faced by a relentless social barrier of prejudice and lack of confidence on the part of such as could lend a helping hand and give men who often have resolved to lead good lives, a chance at least to try. Mrs. Booth firmly believes that many discharged prisoners might gain a lost foothold. She also advocates prison reforms that would make for hope and recovered manhood.

"The training of wild animals" is an animal book out of the ordinary, for the writer, Frank C. Bostock, has spent his life with wild beasts and knows all their ways, their whims, their good points, and their bad. The book tells interestingly how the lad Bostock proved his fitness for an animal trainer despite his father's hope of a Church of England career for his son; of thirty years' experience with lions and tigers, elephants, and other wild creatures; and gives many details of the training—always a work of unlimited patience, courage, and endurance—which tames the wild animal into his trainer's puppet.

His amusing and exciting experiences, ashore as well as afloat, afford a striking panorama of our war with Mexico. Grant, Lee, McClellan, Beauregard and other famous generals are introduced at the beginning of their careers.

Brady, Cyrus Townsend. Sir Henry Morgan, Buccaneer: a romance of the Spanish Main; il. by J. N. Marchand and Will Crawford. N. Y., G: W. Dillingham Co., [1903.] c. 5-447 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

The greatest of all pirates, the author thinks, was Sir Henry Morgan who played his brutal, rapacious game so successfully that he was knighted by Charles II. It is a work of imagination, not a historical novel, but the acts attributed to the human monster are well authenticated. One of the writer's objects is to show that England produced a pirate as villainous as any of the Spaniards that figured in "Westward Ho" and other Anglo-Saxon romances.

He claims that the best-known experts in economics do not put their most personal opinions into print. He has met almost all of them and voices many thoughts received from them though he does not always quote. Both sides of all questions relating to capital and labor are clearly set forth. Specially timely are his statements concerning every coal-strike that has thus far taken place.

Spencer Kellogg Brown was born in New York in 1842. He went with his father to eastern Kansas in 1854, and in course of time came in contact with John Brown, to whom he was not related, and served under him, being in thorough sympathy with his abolition theories. He afterwards enlisted in the Northern army, and was captured by the rebels and hung as a spy. The editor believes that the letters and journals embodied in the book have rare value as sketches illustrative of the early history of Kansas and of the conduct of the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

This first volume of aster studies is confined to the general historical treatment—leaving the description of species to a volume soon to follow. It traces the history of aster to 1600, or through the continuance of the ancient monotype conception of aster; that is, until Clusius' polytype conception came into full dominance as embodied in the series of aster species set forth by him in 1601. The writer has aimed to present the history of aster from Greeks to Clusius in such a way as to show its relations to other botanical thought and writing, and to disentangle the constantly recurring confusions with other blended genera. This involves notice of all important plant-writers before Clusius, constituting this volume a sketch of the history of pre-Clusian botany.

A succession of short love stories, each related to the other and making a novel. The main story concerns one Belle Norine who is to be crowned Queen of a Flower festival in a small California town. Mysteriously, on the night set for the ceremony, she disappears, and Isyl, her maid of honor, is crowned in her place. This main story is devoted to solving the riddle of Norine's disappearance, but on its thread are hung many accounts of adventure in love, bearing such titles as "The tale of love terpsichorean," "The tale of love militant," etc.

The boarders or "pensionnaires" brought together in the "pensions" of the European continent include natives of the whole world and life in these wholly original houses brings about cosmopolitanism and leads to associations and friendships that shape many lives. The chief pensionnaires are a New York mother and a daughter studying singing. The reader meets them in Dresden, Milan and Switzerland. The singer is followed by a German idealist who teaches her to put soul into her phenomenal and perfectly trained voice.

Professor Carpenter presents the results of a fresh study of Whittier's life and work, in the light of recently accessible sources of information. He is a sympathetic biographer, for he comes himself of old New England stock and his studies have had largely to do with our native literature. Written on the lines made familiar by the earlier books of the American Men of Letters Series, to whch it belongs, this life gives a succinct account of Whittier's activities as a politician, poet, and reformer.

"This book originated in a course of lectures delivered in various towns in England, Scotland, and Wales, during the years 1900-1903. Their object was to awaken the interest of Christians of all churches in the modern study of the sacred books of their religion, by sketching the history of the processes of investigation, and indicating some of the results which have been so far attained. In preparing the lectures for the press, it was possible to expand the treatment of some topics. . . ."—Preface.

"The present work is devoted to the history of Beatrice, Duchess of Milan, who, as the wife of Lodovico Sforza, reigned during six years over the most splendid court of Italy. The charm of her personality, the important part which she played in political life at a critical moment of Italian history, her love of music and poetry, and the fine taste which she inherited, in common with every princess of the house of Este, all help to make Beatrice singularly attractive, while the interest which she inspires is deepened by the pathos of her sudden and early death."—Preface. Beatrice was the younger sister of Isabella d'Este, Marchioness of Mantua.

The treatment of Mr. Chadwick's "Channing" is similar to his biography of "Theodore Parker," and will engage the attention of readers and students of the anti-slavery conflict, for Channing's relation to this subject abounded in dramatic interest and had an individuality which is carefully brought out. Of more immediate importance is his prophetic attitude with reference to the liberality of the sects and the problems of sociology and philanthropy. The main intention is to exhibit Channing's vital criticism of our present tendencies and his encouragement to our higher aspirations.

Captain La Barge's life embraced the entire era of active boating business on the river. He saw it all—from the time when the Creole and Canadian voyageurs cordelled their keelboats up the refractory stream, to the time when the railroad won its final victory over the steamboat. He was on the first boat that went to the far upper river, and he made the last through voyage from St. Louis to Fort Benton. He typified in his own career the meteoric rise and fall of that peculiar business. He grew up with it, prospered with it, and was ruined with and by it. He saw and shared the wonderful metamorphosis that came over the Missouri Valley in the space of four score years, and his reminiscences are a succession of living pictures taken all along the line.

The present edition is a revision of the entire work. The first part, which is historical, contains much new material on the early history of the park, with many additions to the geographical names and a new account of the Nez Percé campaign, 1877. The second part, which is descriptive, is greatly enlarged in the chapters on tonography, geology, thermal springs, fauna and flora, roadways and their administration. The tour of the Park has been entirely recast to conform to the completed road system which opened up new sections of the Park. The illustrations are nearly all original.

The words and phrases which are here collected under the general term Americanisms may be fairly classed under four heads. First, genuine English words obsolete or provincial in England and universally used in the United States. Second, English words conveying in the United States a different meaning from that attached to them in England. Third, words introduced from other languages than the English, French, Dutch, Spanish, Indian, etc. Fourth, Americanisms proper, i.e., words coined in the country, either representing some new idea or peculiar product. Particular attention has been paid to the fauna and flora and to the words derived from foreign languages, especially the French and Spanish.—Preface.

Dr. J. B. Clark, Secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, whose work in the home missionary field is known throughout the country, was granted by his Board a leave of absence in which to prepare a non-sectarian history of the work. His book is carefully written with the assistance of the secretaries of the Boards of other denominations and will make a standard history of home-missionary work. At the same time it is so popular in its style as to entirely fulfil the requirements of the subtitle, "The story of American home missions."

The success of Prof. Classen's work in the original together with the fact that the English edition published in 1878 is now out of date, seem to make a new English edition of this valuable work desirable. Prof. Classen's arrangement of the matter in the work—advancement from simple crystallizable salts, to alloys, minerals, ores, slags, metal, waters, etc., of increasing difficulty—makes it admirably adapted to the needs of the beginning student. The work is no less suited to the practical chemist. A few additions have been made to the German text. Also an appendix added on the qualitative analysis of minerals, ores, slags, metals, alloys, etc., including the rare elements, by Norman F. Harriman, Assistant in Chemistry in the University of Michigan.

"This book endeavors to portray Japan in all its features as a modern world power. It cannot be expected to cover in great detail all the ground outlined, because it is not intended to be an exhaustive encyclopædia of 'things Japanese.' It is expected to gratify the specialist, not by furnishing all materials, but by referring for particulars to works where abundant materials may be found. It is expected to satisfy the average general reader by giving a kind of bird's-eye view of 'Modern Japan.'"—Introduction.

The general plan is to introduce each of the larger groups of animals by the careful study of a typical representative. It is the aim to present a fairly complete picture of the life of this type—its place of living; its manner of securing food; its enemies and its means of protection; its mode of locomotion; the processes of digestion, circulation, and respiration; its development; its relation to the plant world, to other animals, and to man.

The art of living long: a new and improved English version of the treatise of the celebrated Venetian centenarian, Louis Cornaro, with essays by Joseph Addison, Lord Bacon and Sir William Temple. Milwaukee, Wis., W: F. Butler, [N. Y., Moody Publishing Co.,] 1903. c. 5+214 p. por. O. cl., $1.50; princess binding, $1.

Cornaro was a Venetian born in 1464, who lived to a few years over one hundred. At forty he was believed by his physicians to be in a condition of hopeless invalidism; out of this he came by his own efforts, and lived to a great old age of perfect health. The three essays comprised in this work were written by him at the age of eighty-six, at ninety-one and at ninety-five. "Temperance in all things" is the text of each. To eat little, to drink no intoxicating liquors, exercise and cold water bathing, are his chief remedies against old age and disease. This work was at first published in Milwaukee, by Mr. W: F. Butler. It has now passed into the hands of the Moody Publishing Co., who will in future be Mr. Butler's distributing agents.

The author has taken the true story of Hetty Wesley, the beautiful, brilliant and unhappy sister of John and Charles Wesley and worked it into a historical novel. The picture of life at Epworth Parsonage where father and mother differed on almost every topic except in the sacrifice of all their daughters to the career of the sons who became world famous. In view of the Wesley bicentennial celebrations these delineations of the characters of the Wesley household are timely. The contrast of character between John and Charles Wesley is presented with great care.

The statement of a theory based upon investigations during several years by various members of the department of botany. The common or independent origin of monocotyledons and dicotyledons is discussed, the conclusion being reached that they are independent lines. The general conclusion is reached that the angiosperms have been directly derived from the eusporangiate ferns, the transition forms to the monocotyledons being unknown; but the transition forms to dicotyledons being represented by the abundant and problematical "proangiosperms" of the early cretaceous.

Dr. Cremer, who is a theological professor in Greifswald University, the German stronghold of orthodoxy, is recognized not only in his own country but throughout the religious world as one of the ablest and most eloquent of the supporters of evangelical Christianity. His lectures in reply to the critique, "What is Christianity," by Prof. Harnack, the foremost of the so-called "higher critics," attracted instant attention throughout Germany as by far the strongest of the many answers to the attack of the brilliant Berlin professor. Unlike other opponents of Harnack, Dr. Cremer refuses to meet the higher criticism upon the field that it has chosen for the contest, viz., the critical examination of the New Testament text, particularly that of the Gospels. He denies that the essence of Christianity is comprehended in the teaching of Jesus in the four Gospels, and affirms that it is found rather in the teachings of the evangelists and apostles about Jesus.

The country boy is a sensitive, dreamy soul growing up in the sugar maple districts of New England. The sordid aims and actions of his surroundings trouble his little brain. He has a fine mother and a father who lives by the golden rule but who is not a "professor" and is much criticized by his Calvinistic neighbors. A school teacher brings sunshine into the country boy's life. Not intended for children.

The author thinks Tolstoi is the only author who has placed the doctrine of non-resistance upon a substantial basis. While studying the subject the writer found next to nothing dealing with the question, but shelves crowded with literature extolling the glories of war and the beneficence of patriotism. The portion of the volume dealing with crime and punishment shows practical knowledge of the machinery of courts of justice. It gives special attention to the cause of crime and the evil and unsatisfactory results of punishment.

Darwin, C: Rob. More letters of Charles Darwin: a record of his work in a series of hitherto unpublished letters; ed. by Francis Darwin. N. Y., Appleton, 1903. c. [Mr.] 2 v., 11+494; 8+508 p. il. por. O. cl., $5 net.

The "Life and letters of Charles Darwin" was published in 1887. Since that date, through the kindness of various correspondents, additional letters have been received, chiefly those written to Mr. Belt, Lady Derby, Francis Galton, Huxley, Lyell, John Morley, Max Muller and a few others. But the material for this work consisted mostly of a mass of letters which, for want of space or for other reasons, were not printed in the "Life and letters." From this unused material it has been possible to compile an almost complete record of Mr. Darwin's work in a series of letters now published for the first time. They are classified by subjects, as evolution, geographical distribution, botany, etc.

"In the following work a first attempt has been made to describe ancient India, during the period of Buddhist ascendancy, from the points of view, not so much of the brahmin, as of the rajput. The two points of view naturally differ very much. Priest and noble in India have always worked very well together so long as the question at issue did not touch their own rival claims as against one another. When it did—and it did so especially during the period referred to—the harmony, as will be evident from the following pages, was not so great."—Preface.

A New York clergyman, full of ideals for the good of mankind, tending strongly towards socialism, by his personal magnetism attracts a vast congregation. His conservative vestry object to many of the throng. One woman gives great sums of money and finally leads the preacher to believe he loves her and needs her for his great work. His wife, who has felt jealousy of the work that so totally absorbs him, awakes to her responsibility and appeals for her rights. But he believes in perfect liberty and marries the enthusiastic worker according to socialistic rites. An old friend, a pessimist always in the socialistic work, also succumbs to the fascination of the enthusiastic "wife." At last the "one woman" solves many problems.

"This work is an attempt to make clear that there is a closer relation than is usually recognized between the attitudes of the child and the serious activities of society in all ages. It is an attempt to bring together from the domain of education, on the one hand, and of anthropology, sociology, and history on the other, ideas that will materially reinforce each other."—Introduction.

This series is to be composed of four books suitable for readers for the primary grades. This first book relates to "the age of fear," when every man's hand was against his fellowman. Beginning with the first people we know anything about, it tells how they lived before they had fire, how they worked before they had tools, what wild beasts lived then, how the tree-dwellers lived and taught their children, how they made tools and weapons, baskets, ornaments, etc. The aim of the series is to teach the child practical activity.

Dos Passos, J: R. The Anglo-Saxon century and the unification of the English-speaking people. N. Y., Putnam, 1903. c. 13+242 p. O. cl., $2.25 net.

Mr. Dos Passos advocates the union of all English-speaking people. He believes, he says in his introduction, that the only real obstacle to a possible entente between the Anglo-Saxon race may rise from the situation in Canada, and he urges that she incorporate herself with the American Republic. In order to prevent an armed conflict, possible in the event of any differences arising between the allied race, he suggests the establishment of an International Supreme Court, with "full jurisdiction to finally determine all disputes which may hereafter arise between us."

Doubts about Darwinism, by A semi-Darwinian. N. Y., Longmans, Green & Co., 1903. 6+115 p. O. cl., $1.25.

"The doubts expressed in this book," says the author, "are confined to Darwinian principles in their application to animal life. Plant life is not discussed. The origin and development of animals must be of far deeper interest to human beings than the same subjects in the case of plants, on account of the inclusion of man among the former. Also a part of these doubts is founded on the maternal and paternal instincts and on consciousness, and has therefore no application to plants."

This successor of "A little girl in old Boston," etc., opens towards the end of the eighteenth century, in what was then the French province of Louisiana. The little girl of nine years is brought from France to the small town of St. Louis, to be given over to the protection of her grandfather reputed to be a rich man. But Renée de Longueville takes a quick dislike to the old man and he has no place for children in his contracted quarters. So she is made over to the care of Gaspard Denys who had loved her mother as a girl. Her growth and the expansion of St. Louis are told in the same story.

The heiress of Great Fanne had received a man's name, because the head of the house had always been called "Robin." The story opens with the return of Robin's cousin to Lesser Fanne, which he owns. The cousins have been betrothed since childhood, and the story deals with the course of their love—another woman coming between them. An early tragedy in the Brilliant family casts a shadow over many of the scenes. As a study of village life and character, in Sussex county, England, the book is most elaborate, and evidently taken from life.

Some of the most characteristic and significant letters Emerson ever wrote were written by him in the course of his protracted correspondence with Grimm, the great German art critic. These have been edited, with an introduction by Frederick W. Holls, and are now first published. The letters from Grimm are printed both in German and in English. Four of Emerson's letters are addressed to Countess Gisela von Arnim, whom Grimm afterwards married.

While frankly a plea for Ireland, Dr. Emmet has endeavored to be impartial, and his indictment of the British Government (he draws a distinction between the English people and the English Government) is supported by documentary evidence. The work is purely historical, and its chief purpose is to show to Englishmen and Irishmen alike the important work done by Ireland in the Middle Ages in behalf of culture, education and Christianity, and to show, further, that Ireland's decline began when the English gained control of the country and took away her liberty, even to the extent of forbidding children to attend school. The Latin text of the Tractatus de Purgatorio Sancti Patricii contained in the Harleian manuscript 3846 is printed for the first time, accompanied in parallel columns by the old French metrical translation of Marie de France, made at the end of the twelfth century. The precise version used by Marie de France has not been found. The Harleian manuscript represents this version more completely and better than any manuscript yet made accessible. The French text has been improved materially by the comparison made with the Latin original. The text of the Tractatus from another British Museum manuscript (Royal 13 B. VIII) is printed in full as an appendix.

Eusebius of Cæsarea surnamed Pamphili. Preparation for the gospel; tr. from a revised text by Edwin Hamilton Gifford, D.D. N. Y., Oxford University Press, (American [illegible] 1903. 2 v., 31+458; 1+459-948 p.

[illegible] Evangelica of Eusebius is the first [illegible] ustratio Evangelica, the most sys[illegible]ehensive of the many apologetic antiquity. The translator's original intention was simply to supply the ordinary English reader with a translation of moderate cost. But the existing editions of the Greek text were found to be so unsatisfactory, that he was obliged to undertake a complete revision of the text founded upon a new collation of the most important manuscripts. The whole work thus became too costly for many of the clergy and younger students of theology, for whose use it had been at first undertaken. But through the consideration of the Delegates of the Clarendon Press the English version is allowed to be sold separately at a reduced price. Two editions it will be seen are offered. The first is the English translation above at a reduced price. The second following comprises also the English translation (2 v.) and the Greek text (3 v.), there being 5 vs. in all although advertised as in 4 vs—v. 3 being in two parts or 2 v.

This work is the outcome of a series of observations commenced at Leipzig in 1894, continued in Birmingham 1897-1898, and during a two years' stay in Oxford (1898-1899), but not completed until 1902 in Birmingham. For convenience, the physics (including chemistry) and the physiology of protoplasmic movement are arranged in separate chapters, although any such division is entirely arbitrary. Under the first heading those phenomena of protoplasmic movement are discussed which can be directly referred to physical and chemical causes, whereas under "physiology" the writer deals with those "vital" phenomena which cannot as yet be thus resolved.

Thomas Ballinger, the old New England schoolmaster, was in bondage to his books. He neglected everything to read and collect. His patient, forgiving wife suffered much. One of his pupils, the daughter of a wealthy grocer, who has all her life learned all that was good and noble from Thomas, got her father to pay his debts and make him librarian of the new library.

A well-to-do English soldier, after twenty years again meets the girl he had loved, and remembers as very pretty and charming. He finds her middle-aged, commonplace to stupidity and the mother of seven children. In these he takes interest and through his invitation Susan, the oldest daughter, meets her fate. She marries a shallow, selfish man. Later a wife appears and drives Susan's husband out of the country. Then Susan devotes herself to art, and by her rare, sweet disposition, and optimistic, poetic nature finds "the rose of joy" in her quiet life.

"This book is a study in civil and administrative history. Its object is to describe the growth, to analyze the character, and to estimate the influence of the Napoleonic system in Germany; of campaigns and battles it will say practically nothing; of diplomacy only so much as will enable the reader to understand how it was that by 1807 Napoleon had become the master of Germany. Personal descriptions will occur, for all systems are worked by men and moulded by those who work them. But the main purpose of the book is not to draw portraits of persons, but to show how the Napoleonic states in Germany were created and governed."—Preface.

"The author says in the European press, more especially in that of Germany, one often meets with the expression 'Middle European Zollverein.' A study of its contents reveals the existence of a movement —more academic than political—contemplating, for one reason or another, great unity of action on the part of certain European countries, primarily Germany and Austria-Hungary. The purpose of this article is to describe this movement and set forth European opinion with reference to a subject whose possible realization might be fraught with enormous economic consequences to the United States."

Fiske, Horace Spencer. Provincial types in American fiction. Springfield, O., Chautauqua Press, 1903. c. 6+264 p. D. (Chautauqua home reading ser.) cl., $1.

The field of American fiction is so wide and so varied that only one phase of it has been touched upon in the present volume—certain types of American provincial life as studied since the Civil War by authors in New England, the South, the Middle West, and the Far West. The effort of the writer has been to confine himself largely to what is called "realistic" literature, and to emphasize the truth of characterization found in such fiction as has come to be generally recognized for its special significance and permanent value as a reflection of certain phases of our national life.

The volumes of "Cosmic philosophy" appear in this edition in an entirely new form, inasmuch as they are prefaced by a scholarly introduction written by Professor Josiah Royce of Harvard University. This introduction in quite extensive, covering 129 pages, and aims to set forth in some detail what was most characteristic about Fiske's method as a thinker and most notable and distinctive about his position as a student of philosophical problems. It further discusses what modification was made in Fiske's position as the result of his study in later years and how as a result of these changes the original form of matter of these volumes would seem to need revision.

The study of conduct which is here offered to students and teachers of philosophy was begun with the intention of furnishing simply a plain statement of the existing ethical situation—by which I mean an analysis of the moral problem and a definition of the several types of ethical theory. But it was found impossible to make a plain statement without adopting a point of view for the definition of the problem and the theories in question. And in the search for a satisfactory point of view I have been led to a more or less independent reconstruction of the situation as a whole."—Preface.

The brazen calf is so-called society style, fashion and imitation of the doings of the "400" as reported in the most circulated newspapers. The worshippers are chiefly women made idle by too much money and lacking refinement and true culture. In a New York boarding-house the characters are supposed to meet by means of whom the author of "The literary shop" points his moral.

Ford, Paul Leicester. A checked love affair; and The Cortelyou feud; with photogravures by Harrison Fisher; with cover decorations by G: Wharton Edwards. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1903. [O.] c. '96-'03. 7-112 p. O. cl., $2.
The first story concerns itself with two young Americans in New York society; the one a wealthy girl hemmed in by the conventionalities of society, and the other a young fellow hemmed in by the restrictions of poverty. The second story, also laid in New York, tells of a life-long disagreement between two related families, both of them rather stronger of heart than of head which is finally bridged over by the little god Cupid who was not kept off by the Cortelyou feud.

The hero is a young Englishman, cousin of a Duke, who is left almost penniless by his father's death. He comes to New York to seek his fortune, and from clerking in a photograph establishment, becomes a successful dramatist. The crisis in his life seems to come all at once, when his cousin the Duke dies suddenly and he inherits an English dukedom. The question with him then is shall he go back to England and to his first love "Mollie," or remain in America and marry the young actress who has done so much for his play? The reader is left to guess his decision.

The Château Monsigny, one of the oldest houses in France, is the scene of this new love story, by the author of "Journeys end." Isabeau de Monsigny, to whom the estate devolves, through her mother, in lieu of male heirs, is said to be the most beautiful and fascinating woman in Europe. Her father is a widower and it is his desire to marry again, and also to find a fitting husband for his daughter which makes the story. There is a woman adventuress who aims to ruin the reputation of Isabeau's lover, and also to marry Isabeau's father.

A story of English middle-class life. The hero, Conrad Clayton, is the son of a self-made man, a wealthy manufacturer of hardware, who considers all religions superstitions, and believes there is no God, and that money and power are the two best things to strive for in life. Conrad has had these views instilled into him from childhood, and has become a cold, hard man, his life exemplifying his narrow creed. While in a worldly sense his career is a great success, he is forced to admit at the end of his life that it has not brought him happiness, and that there is an overruling power that he has not been able to defy.

The first volume contains the editor's preface, a brief "life" of the poet together with a literary estimate and criticism of his writings. The poems cover in addition nearly 300 pages. The second volume presents the maturer poems of Freneau, from the first poetic period through the era of the Freeman's Journal, and is representative of the poet's best work. Some of the best known poems included are: "The British prison ship," "On the memorable victory of Paul Jones," "Slender's journey," "The hermit of Saba," the "Amanda" poems, and "The wild honey suckle." It contains also "The spy," a fragment of a drama (31 pp.) dealing with the capture of Arnold and the André episode. The publishers claim "The present edition of Freneau presents for the first time a trustworthy account of the poet's life and influence, as far as it is possible to know and estimate them, and practically a complete collection of his poems. The editor has endeavored not only to rescue every poem that is in any way significant, but to arrange these poems as far as possible in the order of their composition, or in the order in which they first appeared in print. Such an arrangement, with a poet like Freneau, is virtually an autobiography and furnishes a commentary upon the history of a highly important era. The edition contains much material which, as far as the public was concerned, had practically become extinct."

A study of the constitution of the supreme power in political systems which are not perfectly consolidated. The types examined are: the federal state, the autonomous, colony or dependency, and the protectorate, three forms of political connection characteristic of empires. In preparing this work, the writer has dealt almost exclusively in essentials, the object being to present a brief statement of the principles upon which modern therapeutics are based, and such of the important facts concerning the drugs named as will enable the student of medicine to rationally employ them in the treatment of diseased conditions. The facts presented have been obtained from the experimentation and observation of many able investigators, and from the writer's own experience in practice.

How he wins the maid of his choice and carries her from a hostile city in defiance of Lysander, the Spartan chief, who afterwards lays low the walls of Athens, will be read with interest. The story is laid in a period covering the time of the great Peloponnesian conflict. Conspicuous historic figures of the time, such as Socrates and Alcibiades, are delineated in a lifelike manner.

The three volumes forming the first edition of Mr. Gardiner's book were published in 1894, 1897, and 1901 respectively. Only the first of these, which reached a third edition in 1901, had the advantage of revision and correction by the author himself. However, Mr. Gardiner appended to the third volume, two pages of "Corrigenda" for v. 2, and also inserted in his preface to v. 2 some additional information which had come too late to be employed in the text of his narrative. These corrections and additions are now incorporated in their proper place, either in the text or the notes. This work as first projected was intended to be in four volumes, but Mr. Gardiner fell ill, soon after he published the third volume of his history. He was, unhappily, able to complete very little of the proposed fourth volume, and the chapter now printed is the only part of it in a sufficiently advanced state for publication.

Garland, Hamlin. Hesper: a novel. N. Y., Harper, 1903. [O.] c. 5+445 p. D. cl., $1.50.

Hesper was the name given to Ann Rupert, a gently bred girl who accompanied her delicate young artist brother to the far western mountains and there made the acquaintance of miners and ranchers, real men who contrasted glaringly with the conventional men of her former artificial social life. A unionist strike among the wildest scenery is the background for the wooing of Ann by the man to whom she is always Hesper.

At twenty, Clara Wood, after having been brought up to expect a fortune finds herself absolutely penniless by the sudden death of her adopted mother. She goes through several disagreeable experiences in the capacity of governess, her good looks making her an object of interest to the men of the families where she is employed. Disgusted with governessing she determines to devote her talents to obtaining a husband and intrigues to become the nurse of a feeble-minded woman, that she may have a chance to exercise her fascinations upon her artist son. Miss Wood has avowedly aimed to follow in the footsteps of "Becky Sharp" but her conscience makes itself heard in the most critical moments of her career.

Gilman, Bradley. Ronald Carnaquay, a commercial clergyman. N. Y., Macmillan, 1903. [Ap.] c. 8+374 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A novel, which aims to "hold the mirror up to nature" as manifested in certain phases of the church life of our time. The author depicts, with both humor and pathos, a pastor's relations with his congregation, his trustees, and some of the women of his flock. One of the chief interests of the story lies in the development of the character of the rector who has been a commercial traveller, and who goes into the church for what he can get out of it. The woman in the story is a widow, young and not without charm, and it is her influence on the commercial rector around which the story plays.

The writer claims "the home has not developed in proportion to our other institutions, and by its rudimentary conditions it arrests development in other lines. The two main errors in the right adjustment of our home to our present life are these: the maintenance of primitive industries in a modern industrial community, and the confinement of women to those industries, and their limited area of expression." No word is said against the real home and family life, but the author tries to separate the essentials of a home from the non-essentials that so often wreck a home.

The Noble lectures were delivered last spring at Harvard University. As now published they form a series of popular biographical studies of six great historical figures—Dante, the poet. Michelangelo, the artist; Fichte, the philosopher; Victor Hugo, the man of letters; Wagner, the musician; and Ruskin, the preacher. The purpose has been to present in a clear and vivid portraiture each of these great personalities, and to show how each one of them was, without always intending it, a witness to the light of the world.

Fifteen years have passed since Dr. Goode's work was first published. It has been some years out of print. The work was a summary of the observations and reports of a large corps of experts in ichthyology as well as fisheries and economics originally employed by the Census Bureau. It contained a fund of information that could not be found in any other work accessible to the general public, and it still holds that place. Nevertheless, in the lapse of time, many changes had been made in the nomenclature of the species, not a few species had been added, and several important groups of fishes that had been neglected required attention. Besides the corrections of small errors and the insertion of new illustrations, new chapters have been included on the white-fishes, the smelts and their relatives, the eel and its kin, and the sturgeons. The work has altogether been revised and brought up to date.

Greaves, R: Brewster's millions. Chic., Herbert S. Stone & Co., 1903. [Ap20.] c. 3+325 p. D. cl., $1.50.
Montgomery Brewster, a young New Yorker, is left seven millions by an uncle he has never seen, on condition that he is absolutely penniless a year from the uncle's death. As Brewster has just inherited a million from his grandfather, the year is devoted to spending the million in hand that he may acquire his uncle's wealth. The story is an account of his wild dissipations in his effort to become penniless.

To prepare an introduction to his "Book-trade bibliography in the United States in the XIXth century" published in 1898 the author first began collecting the material out of which this book grew. It became too much for its purpose, and was made a separate book. Through his connections with publishers, librarians, bibliographers and collectors in America and Europe much very rare material was consulted, and the very scarce fac-similes and portraits were put at his disposal. The chapter on "The beginnings of book-trade bibliography" is a distinct contribution to the subject. The annotations to the bibliography compiled by Mr. Wilberforce are full of rare information.

Morris Monk, to his father's disgust, left a good position and then spent eight years in an English sea-coast town trying to perfect an invention he called an aërophon, intended to bring within mortal reach transcendental and unearthly aims. In an old church he made his electric attempts. To please his father he agrees to marry. Then by accident he meets Stella Fregelius, a Danish girl of ideal character. Although able to follow his wildest flights of imagination and to understand all his mechanical devices, Stella is a true woman and also helps him do his duty.

More than twenty years ago Dr. Hale went to Europe and left behind him a family of young people whom he had told that New England history had no ballads. He proposed that while parted they all should take certain episodes of New England life and try to supply the existing want. This book contains the ballads written during the years since elapsed. The short introduction to the ballads are full of folk lore and general information on New England conditions in the periods covered.

Some years ago the author became interested in the wonderful system of the all-around physical training that has made the Japanese, small people though they are, the greatest athletes and the happiest of the world's people. This system is known as jiu-jitsu. Mr. Hancock has devoted much of his time during the past seven years to a thorough study of all its principles. In this volume he explains it in detail. He gives descriptions of athletic feats that will properly develop each part of the body, and explains the tricks of defence and attack. He gives also the Japanese principles of diet, clothing, bathing, and general good and rational living.

Mr. Hapgood claims that this is "a genuine human document"; that he met the ex-pickpocket and burglar, who is the hero of these chronicles, soon after his release from a third term in the penitentiary and took down from his lips the story of his life. He was an east side New York boy, of "poor but honest parents" who took to "graft" naturally at the age of six; for more than twenty years he was a professional thief, spending half of that time in state's prison. His story, told apparently in his own words, is a succession of clever stealing.

Harraden, Beatrice. Katharine Frensham. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1903. [O.] c. 5-362 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Clifford Thornton, a chemist of means, living for his work, finds himself thwarted at every step by his wife, a woman of high temper and totally uncongenial temperament. He tells his son of fifteen that he must separate from the mother. That night the mother dies. While desolate, father and son meet Katharine Frensham, a woman of thirty-six, who brings them cheer and warms their repressed English natures. Much of the story plays in Norway and Sweden where Katharine Frensham goes with botanical specimens for scientists. Telepathy plays an important part in the plot. Many songs and music of Scandinavia are given in the text.

Wally Wanderoon is pictured as a quaint little old man who was hunting on the roadside for "the good old times," when he was discovered by a negro girl and her playmates. The children enter into a conversation with him and accept an invitation to go to his home; here they see a tall piece of furniture resembling a cupboard, which proves to be a story-telling machine; this is manipulated by Wally Wanderoon, hence a series of stories based on negro folk lore.

Prof. Harrison of the University of Virginia, the author of the present biography, is the editor of the Virginia edition of Poe's works. The biography fills the first of the two volumes of the present work, the second volume is a collection of Poe's letters and of letters written him by his friends and literary contemporaries, including Dickens, Irving, Longfellow, Lowell, Greeley and others. The two volumes supplement each other. They give a new picture of the author's habits and works. They represent original research and the accumulation of important material from widely scattered or generally inaccessible places. Bibliography (25 p.).

Nearly twenty years ago the son of America's greatest writer published a formal biography of Hawthorne and his wife. His aim is different now. He indites an informal narrative from his own point of view as child, youth and man. Julian Hawthorne was only eighteen when his father died, but he inherited the circle of friends who had gathered about the father who used his genius for great and good ends only and was never content to do work inferior to his best. Within the circle were Robert Browning, Hiram Powers, William Story, Channing, Maria Mitchell, Edwin P. Whipple, and many more.

The author's two visits to Martinique were made after an interval of three months, in the latter part of May and again in August, and during these times he enjoyed unusual opportunities for the prosecution of his work. During the later visit he was a close witness of the second great eruption of Mont Pelée, having the advantage of being able to make his investigations in a newly-culled field. The illustrations are largely from photographs taken by Mr. Heilprin, and many of them represent, in a way that has probably not been possible before, the consecutive stages in the paroxysmal eruption of a very active volcano.

As an introduction to the main task of this book, the author indicates the strength of the New Testament attestation of the Virgin birth and offers an interpretation of the story as found in the gospels of Matthew and Luke. The theological uses to which the Fathers put the virgin birth narrative, the influence of the apocryphal writings upon their understanding of the story and the relation of their interpretations to the prologue of the Fourth Gospel, are carefully considered.

The narrator of this story is a young English nobleman who, with two companions, goes straight into Toledo, to the rescue of two Englishwomen from the hands of the inquisitors. The apparent hopelessness of the task and seemingly certain and speedy death of the heroes, are offset by a resourceful courage that is indomitable. Among the characters are the feeble and superstitious King Philip, the crafty inquisitors, Senior Toledo and Father Parsons, Sir Walter Raleigh and Admiral Drake.

The characteristic of this book is the author's conception of consciousness. He defines it as "The immediate cognition of the realities of the spiritual and the material worlds." It is identified with "Intuition," which is a figurative term representing immediate cognition, as the eye of the soul, by which it sees the realities presented to it. Hence, he thinks there can be no intuitive beliefs and judgments; these are in truth cognitions. He further explains "The testimony of consciousness is infallible, because it is the cognition, the taking knowledge of the reality itself, which is and is present. This testimony is the origin and the foundation of our entire knowledge."

The love story of Peter the Great's German prime minister. In the opening chapter a vivid picture is given of the semi-barbarous people that the great Czar was to mold into one of the leading nations of the earth. Peter, dissolute and violent, but glorified by his will and noble purpose, is strongly drawn. Along with Ostermann's experiences with his patrician wife is sketched his brave struggle to continue Peter's work in spite of the weaker rulers that followed.

"In preparing the revised edition which has become necessary, I have altered nothing in Sir William Hunter's work but what time has rendered incorrect. The figures of the census of 1901 have been inserted, and the last chapter has been revised where this was necessary and brought up to the Durbar coronation of 1903. Where it was possible I have adopted the words of distinguished public servants in describing the events of the last few years."—W. H. Hutton's Note to 23d ed.

The author says, "A great psychological crime is such a crime against the intelligent soul of man as deprives it of any of the inalienable rights, privileges, benefits, powers or possibilities with which God or Nature has invested it." Her work is an analysis of hypnotism and spiritualism. While admitting some scientific truths regarding each she condemns certain theories regarding them and bad uses to which each is put.

In compiling this work, the two objects which have primarily been kept in mind are the claim of poetry and the demand of the children; but, since the collection is intended chiefly for the pleasure of our boys and girls, the demand of the children has been considered first. For this reason, most of the old favorites which, because of their very familiarity, deserve a place in all collections of children's verse, have been selected, together with a generous quantity of nursery rhymes; it has been deemed wise also to include the most desirable specimens of recent juvenile poetry.

The thirty-one assassinations famous in history are arranged chronologically and embrace a period of nearly twenty-five centuries, beginning with Philip of Macedon (336 B.C.) and including Alexander I. and Draga, King and Queen of Servia (June 10-11, 1903.) The stories of these assassinations have never before been brought together in one volume. The author makes each of the assassinations the central scene of a picture in which the national, religious and political features of the crime are portrayed with impartiality and historical fidelity.

Journal (The) of Arthur Stirling ("The valley of the shadow"); rev. and condensed; with an introd. sketch. N. Y., Appleton, 1903. [F.] c. 15+356 p. D. cl., $1.25 net.

Describes the trials and tribulations of a man of education and culture who had high literary aspirations, his wanderings among publishers and magazine editors, the impressions he gained by the way, and his death by suicide. A painfully real "human document" of the poverty and suffering of one who may or may not be a real personage. The story is told in a way to give the impression that Arthur Stirling really lived, but it turned out since the book has been published that it is merely a work of fiction.

A timely novel which deals with machine politics and other social and political problems which affect the life of all our great American cities. The hero whose fictitious name is Larry O'Brien, is a self made man, and a party boss whose action strongly resembles a well known New York politician. In the story he is brought into contest with characters (evidently real) who advocate Fusion and Reform. It is needless to say that with big odds against him, the machine man triumphs. There is a love affair as a side issue.

Although deaf, dumb and blind the outlook upon life of Helen Keller is one of cheerfulness and hope. She thinks the content must be first within ourselves founded on perfect faith and trust; then that we must look on the good and ignore what seems disastrous, and lastly that cheerfulness grows by steady practice. She disapproves of the view of life of Schopenhauer and Omar Khayyám. Her essay shows wide reading and a thorough acquaintance with the social and political problems of the day. Her style is terse and fluent.

"This book is in three parts. The first two, Miss Keller's story and the extracts from her letters, form a complete account of her life as far as she can give it. Much of her education she cannot explain herself, and since a knowledge of that is necessary to an understanding of what she has written, it was thought best to supplement her autobiography with the reports and letters of her teacher, Miss Anne Mansfield Sullivan."—Editor's Preface. Miss Keller was born in 1880 in northern Alabama, and became deaf and blind through scarlet fever. To Dane Kempton, the foster-father of Herbert and Barbara Wace, love is nearly the whole of life; at least, life has passed by him who has not loved. And through these letters the woman's side of the problem appears and reappears. Since publication the authorship has been traced to Jack London and Anna Stransky.

A character study of Kirk Thayer, an English artist and a great genius. He lives solely for his art, his supreme selfishness counting no sacrifice too great of friends or those near and dear to him in his pursuit of fame. To obtain a model for a picture he has conceived, he marries an innocent young girl he meets while on a yachting cruise on a wild island on the northern coast of Scotland. He brings her to London, and breaks her heart in his selfish indifference to her happiness. Two other characters figure in the book, an American woman and her husband, the woman having been one of his models.

An educated, highly accomplished Indian girl, who comes on a visit to a western army post, as the niece of an army officer's wife, is the centre of both mystery and crime. Her Indian origin is unsuspected, and while aiming to fascinate the men who surround her, she is working secretly for her own people, the Sioux Indians. Chief of her victims is a brave young officer, whose career is almost ruined by her unscrupulousness. An Indian campaign, plenty of romance and adventure, all add to the interest of the story.

King, T: B. John Counsellor's evolution; or, a real experience of the second coming. St. Louis, Mo., The J. Counsellor Publishing Co., 1903. [My9.] c. 447 p. O. cl., $2.

John Counsellor's evolution began in 1856. Through the unjust persecution of a Methodist minister and the unchristianlike behavior of his fellow townsmen, John grows to regard his former beliefs as heresies. In time, however, he becomes a Methodist preacher. While preaching doctrines that are unsatisfying to him, a spiritual light is cast upon him and believing that he has received Christ into his life anew John accepts and preaches a belief similar to that of Alexander Campbell.

It is the first to include a considerable number of essays and poems hitherto unindentified or uncollected—some sixty pages in all; it is the first to include the 'Dramatic specimens' and Garrick extracts; and when the volumes containing the 'Letters' are reached, they will be found to contain, in addition to other new letters, a fuller share of Mary Lamb's correspondence than has previously been considered needful. The system of arrangement is also fresh, and in annotation a severer standard of thoroughness than other editors have thought necessary has been adopted."—General Introduction to works.

Professor Le Conte was widely known as a man of science, and notably as a geologist. His later years were spent at the University of California. But his early life was passed in the South; there he was born and spent his youth; there he was living when the Civil War brought ruin to his home and his inherited estate. His reminiscences deal with phases of life in the South that have unfailing interest to all students of American history. His account of the war as he saw it has permanent value. He was in Georgia when Sherman marched across it. Professor Le Conte knew Agassiz, and writes charmingly of his associations with him.

Mr. Leigh's "Appreciation" which opens this volume, points out Voltaire's great work in the field of intellectual liberty. Following is a list of the innumerable publications relating to Voltaire which appeared during his life, and subsequently, under "Voltaireana" (6 p.) The index is for the new 42 vs. edition of his works. Of this index, Mr. Leigh says: "Voltaire is here made to portray himself. This aims to be an index, through his works, of the man. For this reason there have been scattered through the ordinary entries examples of his literary style and play of thought. Epigrammatic sentences, passages from essays, dramas, and poems, give life to the dry bones of index matter. . . ."

"The letters selected are all characteristic of Leo. Taken together they express his sentiments on the chief questions of a time which, owing to his great influence in civil as well as in ecclesiastical matters, is really an epoch in the history of men. His influence on scientific studies alone is sufficient proof of this. . . . A perusal of the letters will satisfy the reader that in other spheres, as well as in that of science, in education, sociology, and statesmanship, the late Pontiff, by adapting himself to his age and studying carefully its needs and possibilities, has so influenced its thought and tendencies, as to have opened a new era in its history."—Preface.

The writer of these letters Mlle. Julie de Lespinasse, has been acknowledged by Mrs. Ward as the original of the leading character in "Lady Rose's Daughter"—Julie Le Breton. The parallel between their lives is unmistakable. Julie de Lespinasse lived in France in the 18th century, and was a protegeé of the celebrated Mme. Du Deffand, and the natural daughter of a woman of rank. She loved and was loved by two different men, finally dying broken hearted. Her letters are the history of her life, told with much frankness and feeling.

The subject of osmotic pressure has recently become a very important one in physiology. On the animal side, the work of Loeb and others has pointed out that the osmotic pressure of the liquid in which organisms are growing often determines, in a large measure, how they will grow and what form they will take. With plants the same is true as has been conclusively shown by the experiments of the author with lower forms. Thus his volume fills a need felt by students of both branches of physiology. The discussion is always from the standpoint of plant life, but where evidence from the animal side is needed it is brought in.

Norma Hardacre is destined by her parents to make a fine match, in the worldly sense, as they need money to patch up their crumbling fortunes. She is beautiful, witty and distinguished looking. Yielding to her mother's influence, she engages herself to a rich man she does not love. Afterward, within three days of her wedding, she discovers that she loves an impecunious artist, and refuses to keep her engagement. Her father discards her and she passes some unhappy hours between her love and her abhorrence of poverty. The end is a surprise.

A story of wild life in the Klondike, in which human nature as well as animal life are seen at both their best and their worst. The hero, "Buck," is a magnificent dog, who was stolen from a luxurious home in southern California and trained for a sledge dog in Alaska. The training process and the hardships he endures develop his dominant traits, and "Buck" becomes master of the pack. The first strong note in the book is the coming out of the dog's good blood through infinite hardship; the last, when he finally obeys "the call of the wild," and relapses into savagery, because his last and best friend was killed by Indians.

A story for the young with a fairy tale motive in an entirely realistic setting. A country boy, who has a marvellous power of plucking fruit from the bare branches of any tree, goes to New York, and with a friend starts in the fruit business, and makes a large sum of money in a couple of weeks of their partnership. There is a cruel stepfather, and his adventures in New York in search of the boy, together with the many city scenes in connection with the hero's experiences make it an amusing story.

Points out especially the consummate skill for intrigue possessed by the Queen who became regent after the death of Henry IV. of France. Very clearly the author treats the characters of the Prince de Condé, the Duc de Bouillon, the Marechal d'Ancre, the Comte de Soissons and the Ministré de Villeroy and the relations in which they stood to the Regent. New light is thrown upon the reasons for the loss of place of the once all-powerful Sully.

A severe arraignment of church and society. The author's first novel. Dr. Lorimer is pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church and formerly of the famous Tremont Temple, of Boston. The plot turns upon the story of a young Scotchman, made a scapegoat by his rascally nephew, and driven from his home to Australia. His named changed, Australia yields him an immense fortune. He returns to England, rehabilitates himself as a man of honor, is beset by enemies, finally dies strangely, back in the Australia wilds. In the fashionable English West End, among the clergy of the rich, in convents, in the bypaths and reeking alleys of London's East End, the story moves.

A reply to Mr. T. W. H. Crosland's "The unspeakable Scot." Behind the author's almost transparent pseudonym may lurk a clever, humorous and wholly good-natured Englishman or American. He shows up the weaknesses of the English sportsman; man-of-business, man-about-town; and of the English army, navy, churches, poets, fiction, drink, food, education, recreation, etc. The chapter on Chiffon, the English wife of the hour, proves that the women folk of the egregious English are much like all other wives, possibly excepting the wife of "the unspeakable Scot."

In this second series as in the first the author says he means the men of the Bible who represent phases of humanity irrespective of place and time. He considers these only in the incidents in which they are representative and not as historical studies, but as character studies. Ishmael the outcast; Lot the lingerer; Baalam the inconsistent; and Aaron the vacillating are among the many characters analyzed.

This biography was written in answer to a request made at a representative meeting of missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a few weeks after the death of Bishop Parker. The writer has two objects in view. First to give a fairly intelligible and connected account of the life of Bishop Parker. Second to give as much information as possible about the Methodist Episcopal missions in India which were associated with his name. One of the chapters was prepared by J. W. Robinson, a former colleague of Bishop Parker.

Elie Metchnikoff, now professor at the Pasteur Institute in Paris, was born in Russia. He is one of the high priests of bacteriology, and has made wonderful discoveries relative to human bacteria. He is a disciple of Darwin and does not believe in man's immortality. He believes human life could be prolonged to 140 years. The present work is devoted to a consideration of the gravest and most serious problems of humanity, to life and sex and death and the fear of death. The work is spoken of in England as the most valuable production since Darwin's "Origin of species."

Captain George Wilton, of the Royal Irish Fusileers, stationed in India, married an American and his mother faints. Two years after he sent her home to spend the winter with his family. Her sister and she grew wearied of the deadly monotony of the correct English home. They planned a winter in London. Under the name of Mrs. Osborne the young wife posed as a beauty, met a former lover, danced and flirted. Her sister kept in touch with the soldier in India, and all ended as a bright, amusing comedy.

The author is President of the United Mine Workers in America and a leader in the labor movement. His book which is broad in its scope deals with many phases of the labor problem, notably it traces the development of the trade union in England and in the United States, and endeavors to show the attitude of the workman, the capitalist and the public to organized labor. The open shop, the working hour, trusts and strikes are also discussed.

Mitchell, Silas Weir, M.D. A comedy of conscience. N. Y., Century Co., 1903. [Mr.] c. 1900, 1903. 3+129 p. S. cl., †$1.

Serena Vernon, a charming young woman with an uncompromising New England conscience, comes into possession of a very valuable diamond ring at the moment that she is deftly relieved of her own pocket-book. She has so much the better of the involuntary bargain that immediately she begins "ingeniously to torment herself" with the perplexing ethics of the situation. Following are many comedy scenes, and a little love affair in which obliging "Cousin John" figures prominently.

The reign of William IV., though brief, covered a period rich in intellectual interest in England's history, of which little is known. This work scarcely touches upon politics, though prominence is given to the great political personages of the time, in the great procession of courtiers, poets, writers, players, women famed for beauty or talent, beaux wits and club gossips, that passes before the reader, page by page, like figures in a morning panorama. Among the distinguished company, we find such names as Thackeray, Tennyson, Browning, Lady Byron, Disraeli, Harriet Martineau, Fanny Kemble, Macready, and others equally famous.

Moss, Mary. A sequence in hearts. Phil., Lippincott, 1903. 333 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A story of the fads and follies and unrest that make up the life of the average society girl, who more than all else fears to differ from her "set." Marriage, and a baby which she brings up by differing books of advice change frivolous Violet into the most common-place of women. Her most intimate girl friends watch, wonder and criticize according to varying characters. The "sequence in hearts" seems to rest with the men of the story who all three change from the girl they first love to the girl they finally marry. Strikes and methods of settling play a part in this story of American life of the present day.

The scene is laid in the secluded farming region of southern Pennsylvania some thirty years ago and the story is chiefly concerned with the fortunes of the spirited and beautiful young lady whose name gives the book a title. She and her sister and a Virginia aunt are left, by the death of her father, in financial straits and with a huge unremunerative estate. Their family pride revolts at the changes and improvements suggested by the common sense of their guardian. It is he who brings young John Burt from the north as overseer, in the hope of saving the situation by business management. The resulting love story (or double love story) is full of charm.

A fascinating young man, claiming to be a Polish patriot, travelling incognito, is received by several good New York families. A young girl who had spent the previous year in France with companions thinks she recognizes him as the perpetrator of a brutal murder and robbery that occurred in an obscure inn where the party spent the night. A good detective story is built up, and clever glimpses given of fashionable and bohemian life in New York City.

The path of the stars is the path of ideals and the great longing to uplift and save the world. The heroine is first seen in Rome singing for Liszt who is overcome by her marvellous and perfectly trained voice. Ill-health prevents her from becoming an artist. After she has met Waldo Laurence her brother gets into business trouble and by will power and joyous thoughts she conquers her physical ailments and becomes a singer. A great Hungarian opera singer and her personation of "Alceste" is the great incentive towards the heroine's final life work.

The scene of this novel is placed, as all the author's work has been, in the Tennessee mountain region, and its period is that of the struggles of the French and English in the early eighteenth century for the control of the Mississippi Valley. The interest of the book centres about a charming old-fashioned love story. The heroine is a Scotch girl, the daughter of a trader among the Cherokees, and the two rivals for her hand are Laroche, a brilliant young officer, and Callum MacIlvesty, a proscribed Scotch baron, serving as a common soldier.

Napoleon Bonaparte, [Napoleon I.,] and Gourgaud, Baron. Talks of Napoleon at St. Helena with General Baron Gourgaud on their journey from Waterloo to St. Helena; tr., and with notes, by Eliz. Wormeley Latimer. Chic., A. C. McClurg & Co., 1903. c. 21+292 p. pors. O. cl., $1.50 net.
Lord Rosebery, in his record of Napoleon's life at St. Helena, speaks thus: "The one capital and superior record of life at St. Helena is the private journal of General Gourgaud. It was written, in the main at least, for his own eye, without flattery or even prejudice. It is sometimes almost brutal in its realism. He alone of all the chroniclers strove to be accurate and on the whole succeeded." This journal, which consists of twelve hundred printed pages, was not published until 1898, and is too prolix for complete translation. The parts omitted by the translator in this edition do not materially alter the interest or value of the work.

Nason, Frank Lewis. The blue goose. N. Y., McClure, Phillips & Co., 1903. [Mr.] c. 7+295 p. D. cl., †$1.50.
The life of the miner, with its hours of wild living above ground, the dominating influence of the greed for gold, and the reckless gambling spirit that is its very basis offers grateful material to the teller of stories. Mr. Nason has taken full advantage of the opportunity and of his intimate knowledge. He has written a tale of cunning and villainy thwarted by dogged honesty, in which a mine superintendent is in conflict with his thieving and vicious employees.

Naylor, Ja. Ball. Under mad Anthony's banner; il. by C. M. Coolidge. Akron, O., Saalfield Pub. Co., 1903. c. 394 p. D. cl., $1.50.

The story opens in Ohio in 1791, in the home of a young pioneer, an English refugee. He leaves his wife in their cabin and starts on a hunting expedition. On his return his wife has disappeared. He finds a letter apparently written to him by her saying she no longer loves him and has returned to England with his cousin. The young man believes her faithless and offers his services to General Anthony Wayne. The fate of the wife is tragical, while the husband goes through some equally sorrowful experiences.

Professor Newcomb, the most distinguished American astronomer, has here given his reminiscences of a long acquaintance with scientific men and movements. His residence for more than forty years at Washington and his visits to Europe have brought him into social relations with many of the most interesting public men of his day on both sides of the Atlantic. He writes with charming frankness and modesty of his own career, and he has many things of value to say on such subjects as great telescopes and their work, the transits of Venus in 1874 and 1882, President Garfield's illness, and the Lick Observatory.

The trilogy of "The epic of the wheat" includes "The octopus," already published; "The pit," just out; and "The wolf," yet to come. These novels, while forming a series, are only connected in their relation to (1) the production, (2) the distribution, (3) the consumption of American wheat. The series when complete will form the story of a crop of wheat from the time of its sowing as seed in California to the time of its consumption as bread in a village of western Europe. "The pit" is the fictitious narrative of a "deal" in the Chicago wheat pit.

Norris, W: E: Lord Leonard the luckless. N. Y., H: Holt & Co., 1903. [Ja.] c. 4+291 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

Lord Leonard had all his life "tried to speak the truth, to see it and to face it, feeling assured that nothing else is worth while." This devotion to truth does not work to the happiness of Lord Leonard, his life being a succession of unfortunate incidents, which wreck his whole career. At first, the son of a younger son, he is studying for the navy, a career he looks forward to with great delight. Several sudden deaths place him at the head of the family, making him a Lord, when he would rather have been a naval officer. Then the woman he loves is false to him—and so on to the end. This is told with the satirical humor of Norris's earlier works.

A simple, untechnical volume which sets forth the nature and meaning of a work of art. The author includes under the term art, not only painting, sculpture, literature, music, and architecture, but also the lesser branches lately developed by the various societies of arts and crafts and shown in the handiwork of the craftsman, in his designing of a rug, a tile, or a candlestick. Written with the definite purpose of interesting the layman and of encouraging his fondness for the things about him.

"An attempt is here made," the author says, "to present the fundamental principles of organic chemistry for the use of those beginning the subject. The most radical departure from the method of treatment adopted in other books treating of the same subject, consists in the dropping of the division into

'fatty' and 'aromatic' compounds, and in the adoption of what appears to the author a more fundamental and logical classification."

Book originally published in 1887 by Charles L. Webster & Co. Long before the last illness of the Pope the author was called to Rome and spent eight years in the Vatican bringing his biography up to date under the eyes of the Pope who gave personal supervision to much of the manuscript. Dr. O'Reilly wrote his book both in French and English. It was only a coincidence that the Pope's death took place just as the author's great task was finished, and this is not a biography gotten up as many will be for timeliness of subject. Many high in the Catholic church commend the work.

The work tells the history of the early transformation of the gospel as it came in contact with its early environment, and shows further that the new Bible-study movement of the century has done much to bring Christianity back to its original sources, and with a result of a clearer understanding of the gospel of Jesus than any other age has possessed. Throughout the whole book the author emphasizes the loyalty to Jesus Christ as a governing position in Christian thinking.

Packard, Jos. Recollections of a long life; ed. by Rev. T: J. Packard. Washington, D. C., Byron S. Adams, 1902. c. 368 p. il. por. O. cl., $2.25.

Dr. Packard was born in Maine of old English stock. He was educated at Andover and Bowdoin, and after filling several other positions was elected to the Professorship of Sacred Literature at the Theological Seminary of Virginia. This was before the Civil War, and his autobiography gives graphic pictures of the easy-going life of the times with slavery in full play. Washington with its prominent figures and national gossip comes in for a share of attention. Many educational, clerical and religious questions are considered.

Professor Palmer's earlier book "The field of ethics" served as an introduction to the study of conduct by defining the field; but the moral problems, though carefully placed, were not debated. The present book grapples with the problems themselves. The most fundamental, The nature of goodness, is discussed, and a clear doctrine in regard to it is established. Professor Palmer takes up the question in its simplest form, and then advances to the more complicated forms of goodness grounded in the differences which separate persons from things.

In a framework of love, law, politics and gossip of a country town of northern Illinois, we have the story of a successful young western lawyer, who is as original in his love making as in his business methods. Tellfair is not very far from Chicago, and is a thriving, typical western town. With a good share of culture, it includes many odd specimens of unpolished human nature. The character sketching is admirable, and evidently from life. Morris Davenport the hero, is by no means a perfect type, but holds the reader's interest and liking. The two heroines are new studies in fiction.

Peary, Mrs. Josephine Diebitsch and Marie Ahnighito. Children of the Arctic, by the "Snow Baby" and her mother. N. Y., F: A. Stokes Co., [1903. O.] c. 5-120 p. il. O. cl., $1.20 net.

The story of the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Peary, and her birth and infancy at the North Pole, was told in "The snow baby." The little girl returned home, but four years later spent another year in the ice. It is the story of this year she tells with her mother's help in the present volume. She tells of the icebergs and the great ice fields, the glaciers, the polar bears, and particularly does she describe the Eskimo children, with whom she played. Profusely illustrated from photographs taken by Commander and Mrs. Peary.

Peat, Anthony B. North. Gossip from Paris during the Second Empire: correspondence (1864-1869) of Anthony B. North Peat, attaché au cabinet du ministre de l'interieur, and later attaché au conseil d'état; selected and arr. by A. R. Waller. N. Y., Appleton, 1903. 5+354 p. por. O. cl., $2.50 net.

The letters from which the following selections have been made were sent daily from Paris during the years 1864 to 1870, by Mr. Peat, attaché au cabinet du ministre de l'interieur and later attaché au conseil d'état, who died from the effects of an accident during the early days of the siege of Paris. They were published in the Morning Star, a daily London paper. As attaché Mr. North Peat saw every morning the telegrams which passed through the Home Office, and thus was enabled to test the accuracy of current reports. He betrayed no confidence, as he had the permission of the French government to use his information as he did. The letters are a selection of about one-twelfth of the original number, and they range over the political and social life of Paris during the few years stated.

"The course in plant physiology which I have given for the last five years at Stanford University has impressed upon me the need of a text-book which treats the subject less exhaustively than Pfeffer's Handbuch and more fully than Noll's section of the Bonn text-book. As I did not know of such a book in any language, I began to write my lectures. These lectures, after repeated working over, have finally taken this definite form. My intention has been to present the main facts of plant physiology and the saner hypotheses regarding them, striving to express safe views rather than to echo the most recent. . . ." —Preface.

Pemberton, Max. Doctor Xavier. N. Y., Appleton, 1903. [O.] c. 4+355 p. il. D. cl., †$1.50.

"Doctor Xavier" was the name the Duke de Montalvan assumed when he schemed to usurp a Spanish principality which figures in the novel as Cadi. The Doctor is introduced as a savant whose interest in science leads him to adopt a young English girl ostensibly for the purpose of assisting him in his experiments. His real motives are revealed after Prince Arthur, the hero, appears on the scene and counterplots to regain his ascendency over the people of Cadi.

According to the editor's Preface "four subjects have been presented in this volume; first the editor gives in his biographical sketch a new statement of facts in regard to Poe's life, which it is hoped will constitute a more pleasing picture than is given in the older and partly erroneous biographies. The new version of his life is founded on facts unearthed by J. H. Ingraham and Professors Woodberry and Harrison. The poems included are those which the editor believes Poe would have liked preserved. The next effort has been to gather from his ephemeral reviews those detached portions which contain his analysis of literary processes."

"In the present collection," says the editor in his Preface, "we have included (with a very few exceptions, one of them 'Hans Pfaal') all the stories which are worth preservation, and indeed some which have been inserted chiefly to round out the variety of which Poe himself made such a point. To emphasize this variety the tales have been grouped under appropriate sub-titles, and each group provided with an introductory study. The text used is what may be called a restoration of Poe's manuscript with such revisions as it is believed Poe would have made had he been living to-day."

"The mediæval period of Indian history, though it does not exactly correspond with the Middle Age of Europe, is not less clearly defined. It begins when the immemorial systems, rule, and customs of Ancient India were invaded, subdued, and modified by a succession of foreign conquerors who imposed a new rule and introduced an exotic creed, strange languages and a foreign art. These conquerors were Muslims, and with the arrival of the Turks under Mahmud the Iconoclast at the beginning of the eleventh century, India entered upon her Middle Age. From that epoch for nearly eight hundred years her history is grouped round the Mohammedan rulers."—Preface.

Aims to present to the student a minimum of rhetorical theory, and a maximum of practical illustrations and exercises. These are chosen from classics with which he is familiar, and from other good books, in which, it is hoped, his interest may be aroused. The advantage of presenting the theory briefly is that the student can grasp a few principles accompanied with much illustration better than he can understand these principles when they are put before him in expanded form with detailed discussion.

This novel has for its hero Cotton Mather Thayer, whose father was a descendant of the Puritans, and whose mother was a Russian musician. The latter gave to him his musical temperament, and the title of the book suggests the author's main motif —the warring strains, Puritan and Slav, in her hero. A leading idea is the mistake a woman makes who attempts to reform a man after marriage. Much of the novel has a decidedly musical atmosphere, and the attitude of some portions of New York society toward musical people is well described.

Rayner, Emma. Handicapped among the free. N. Y., Dodd, Mead & Co., 1903. c. 3+376 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A story of love and patience and victory in defeat. It aims to prove that there is such a thing as the black man's burden—the burden of other men's prejudices and the disabilities caused by long years of degradation. That this burden presses most heavily upon the more highly developed of the race the author has tried to show, in this story, which gives a simple picture of Southern life as it is to-day.

Fort Dearborn guarded the trading-post where now stands Chicago. Life among the officers' wives and soldiers is vividly described. In 1810 the Indians became very dangerous because assured of British countenance. The fort was in charge of an incompetent officer who sacrificed his men after almost driving them to mutiny. A most exciting description is given of the horrors of Indian warfare. The author of "Lavender and old lace" again has charming womanly women in her story.

Robertson, Morgan Andrew. Sinful Peck: a novel. N. Y., Harper, 1903. [Je.] c. 4+325 p. D. cl., †$1.50.

A funny story of an unintentional sailing voyage to Singapore. "Sinful Peck" gave a dinner-party to a number of old friends—respectable bankers, authors, etc.—and in order to win a bet he made them intoxicated and got them shanghaied on a sailing-ship bound for Singapore. The joke at times bade fair to become a very serious matter; but all ended well. The story is crowded with lively incident.
